FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE FORTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

FIRST SESSION.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 18, 1879.

The first session of the Forty-sixth Congress commenced this day at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, in pursuance of the proclamation of the President of the United States of the 4th day of March, 1879. The Senators assembled in the Senate Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT of the United States (Hon. WILLIAM A. WHEELER) called the Senate to order at twelve o'clock meridian.

PRAYER.

Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate, offered the following prayer:

O Thou Builder of the nations, almighty, eternal God, we stand here before Thee to offer up our homage. Thou hast made us a marvel to all people. In all times of peril Thou hast borne us through. In the mystery of our growth and power, in the scope of our change and progress, Thy spirit has brooded over us; Thou hast made our nest in the high places of the earth; and Thou hast caused our course to be like an eagle's flight. With Thee are all the virtues of our welfare; with Thee are the mighty ordinances of our peace, our safety, and our happiness.

Bless the President and Vice-President of the United States. Anoint all our constituted rulers. Constitute the millions of our people more and more in truth and in purity, and consecrate them to Thyself. In the great hours that are telling off our destiny fold Thou this nation in Thine eternal arms of strength. On this new conclave of the people we invoke Thy special blessing. Illumine all these Thy servants in Congress now assembled. Fire them every one with every high inspiration. Breathe all around the amenity of kindness, the magnanimity of justice; and to human judgment add the insight and foresight of Thine own divinity. So shall salvation and honor, glory and blessing, be unto Thee as it was in the days of our fathers; and let all the people ascribe it, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

THE PROCLAMATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate convenes under the proclamation of the President of the United States, which will be reported.

The Secretary (Mr. GEORGE C. GORHAM) read the proclamation, as follows:

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas the final adjournment of the Forty-fifth Congress without making the usual and necessary appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and without making the usual and necessary appropriations for the support of the Army for the same fiscal year, presents an extraordinary occasion, requiring the President to exercise the power vested in him by the Constitution to convene the Houses of Congress in anticipation of the day fixed by law for their next meeting:

Now, therefore, I, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, do, by virtue of the power to this end in me vested by the Constitution, convene both Houses of Congress to assemble at their respective Chambers at twelve o'clock noon on Tuesday, the 18th day of March instant, then and there to consider and determine such measures as, in their wisdom, their duty and the welfare of the people may seem to demand.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 4th day of March, A. D. 1879, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and third.

[SEAL.] R. B. HAYES.

By the President:

WM. M. EVARTS, Secretary of State.

SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will now present the credentials of Charles H. Bell, of the State of New Hampshire, "to fill the vacancy happening in the Senate of the United States by the expiration of the term of Bainbridge Wadleigh, on the 4th day of March, 1879, during the recess of the Legislature of said State, and by the non-election of said Wadleigh's successor." The credentials will be reported at length by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

To all persons to whom these presents shall come greeting:

Know ye that the executive of said State hereby appoints Charles H. Bell, of Exeter, in said State, Senator of, for, and from said State, to fill the vacancy happening in the Senate of the United States by the expiration of the term of Bainbridge Wadleigh, on the 4th day of March, 1879, during the recess of the Legislature of said State, and by the non-election of said Wadleigh's successor, to have and to hold said office of United States Senator until the next meeting of the Legislature of said State, said next meeting being the meeting of the Legislature designated by the laws of the United States for the election of such successor, and being the first meeting of the Legislature at which such successor could be legally elected, and until the expiration of the time for which the executive of said State is authorized to make a temporary appointment for filling the vacancy now existing.

Witness his excellency, Benjamin F. Prescott, governor of New Hampshire, and our seal hereunto affixed, at Concord, this 13th day of March, in the year of our Lord 1879, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and third.

[SEAL.] B. F. PRESCOTT,
Governor.

By his excellency the governor:

A. B. THOMPSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the credentials just read lie upon the table until to-morrow. I make this motion because a grave legal question is presented as to whether there is such a vacancy as can be filled by the appointment of the governor; and it is a matter which should be proceeded in with deliberation by the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the credentials just reported lie upon the table until to-morrow.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw the motion until I submit a few precedents? I do not desire to occupy the attention of the Senate more than a few moments.

Mr. WALLACE. My motion is not open to debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not a debatable motion.

Mr. WALLACE. And I think the business before the Senate should proceed in order, independent of any debate on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to ask a question. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania refuse to withhold for a moment a non-debatable motion that the Senator from New Hampshire may make a statement?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not. I simply said that my motion was one that was not debatable. The Senator asked me to withdraw the motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly; the Senator from New Hampshire did ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to withhold it for a moment that he might make a statement, a brief statement, to the Senate.

Mr. WALLACE. If the Senator so desires I withhold the motion.

Mr. ROLLINS. I will occupy the attention of the Senate but a few moments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania assents.

Mr. ROLLINS. Mr. President, before a vote is taken upon the pending question I desire to submit for the consideration of the Senate such precedents as I find which in my judgment are entitled to weight in the consideration of this case. After the most careful and diligent scrutiny of the records of the Senate, from the foundation of the Government down to the present time, I have found the following cases only of appointments made to fill a vacancy occasioned by the expiration of a term of office:

William Cocke, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, whose term of service expired March 3, 1797, was, on the 22d of April, 1797, appointed by the governor to fill the vacancy occasioned by the expiration of his term. His credentials were presented May 15, 1797, and he was admitted without objection.

Uriah Tracy, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, whose term expired on March 3, 1801, was admitted as a member of the Senate at the special session called March 4, 1801, under the appointment of the governor. Exceptions being taken to his credentials, he was admitted by a vote of 13 yeas to 10 nays, and held his seat until he was elected by the Legislature in May following.

William Hindman, a Senator from the State of Maryland, whose term of office expired March 3, 1801, was appointed by the governor March 4, 1801, and was admitted as a member of the Senate March 5, 1801, without objection. He served until the election of his successor, Robert Wright, in November following.

John Condit was appointed Senator from the State of New Jersey September 1, 1803, in place of Aaron Ogden, whose term expired March 3, 1803. He was admitted as a member of the Senate October 17, 1803, without objection, and held his seat until his election by the Legislature in November following. In this case the appointment does not seem to have been made until a vacancy actually existed, which is identical with the case under consideration.

Joseph Anderson, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, whose term expired March 3, 1809, was admitted as a member of the Senate at the extra session convened on the 4th of March, 1809, without question, under an appointment from the governor of his State. He served until he was elected by the Legislature.

Samuel Smith, a Senator from the State of Maryland, whose term expired March 3, 1809, was admitted as a member of the Senate at the special session of March 4, 1809, under an appointment by the executive. He was admitted without objection and held his seat until elected by the Legislature in November following.

Charles Cutts, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, whose term expired March 3, 1813, was admitted as a member of the Senate at the special session on May 24, 1813, without question, under an appointment by the governor of his State, and served until the election of Jeremiah Mason in June following.

John Williams, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, whose term of office expired March 3, 1817, was admitted as a member of the Senate at the extra session called March 4, 1817, without objection, under an appointment by the executive—his credentials having been read and filed during the previous session—and held his seat until re-elected by the Legislature in October following.

James Lanman, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, whose term expired March 3, 1825, was appointed by the governor February 8, 1825, to fill the vacancy which would occur at the expiration of his term. His credentials were presented at the called session, March 4, 1825, and question being raised, the decision of the Senate was adverse to his right.

The Senate, in this case, as is shown by the report of the committee, decided that a vacancy could not be filled by a governor until it actually existed.

The Lanman case also differs from that of Mr. Bell's, in this; that the legislature of Connecticut which had held its annual session the May previous, notwithstanding it had a legal right to elect a Senator, failed to fill the vacancy.

Ambrose H. Sevier, a Senator from the State of Arkansas, whose term expired March 3, 1837, was appointed by the governor January 17, 1837, to fill the vacancy which would occur at the expiration of his term. At the called session, March 4, 1837, objection was made, but he was admitted.

In both these latter cases of Lanman and Sevier the appointments were made in anticipation of a vacancy which would occur at some future time; and such was the fact in the cases of Messrs. Tracy, Anderson, and Williams, and the decision in the Lanman case stands alone against all the others.

The appointments of Messrs. Cocke, Hindman, Condit, Smith, and Cutts appear to have been made after the vacancy had actually occurred, and they were admitted without question.

These are all the cases found in the records where an appointment has been made by the executive of any State to fill a vacancy occurring by the expiration of a term of office.

In three cases—those of Messrs. Tracy, Lanman, and Sevier—where the appointments were made in anticipation of a vacancy about to occur, question was made; and in two of these cases—Tracy and Sevier—the appointees were admitted, and in the other rejected.

In the five cases where the appointment was made after the vacancy actually occurred, the appointees were admitted without question.

In the case under consideration the appointment was made after the vacancy actually occurred, the credentials bearing date of March 13, 1879; the appointment having been made by the executive of New Hampshire after the expiration of the term of Senator Wadleigh, and subsequent to the call of the President of the United States for an extra session of Congress.

The act of Congress of July 25, 1866, requires that Senators shall be elected by the Legislature "chosen next preceding the expiration" of any term.

By reason of a change in the constitution of New Hampshire which took effect October 1, 1878, two Legislatures were chosen in the year 1878; one in March under the old constitution, whose term of office commenced in June, 1878, and will continue to June, 1879, and the other in November, whose term of office will not commence till June, 1879, and will continue to June, 1881.

Upon a bill being introduced into the Senate of the United States in June, 1878, to define which of these two Legislatures had the power to elect a successor to Mr. Wadleigh, the Committee on Elections and Privileges made a report (No. 485) that only the Legislature chosen in November, 1878, had the power; which report was adopted by the Senate. The Legislature chosen in March thereupon took no steps to elect a successor to Mr. Wadleigh. But the Legislature chosen in November, 1878, cannot be assembled until June, 1879. Therefore in March, 1879, when the vacancy occurred, there was no Legislature in being or capable of being assembled with the power to elect a Senator. On the principle of Sevier's case, therefore, the governor had the right of appointment.

Under these circumstances, Mr. President, with these precedents, I hope the oath of office will be administered to Mr. Bell. Then, if it is desirable to make any inquiry, the credentials may be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and it may be had.

Mr. WALLACE. I must insist on my motion as following the usual precedents in such cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the credentials lie upon the table.

Mr. BLAINE. Until to-morrow?

Mr. WALLACE. Until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

NOTIFICATION TO THE HOUSE.

Mr. THURMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate has assembled, and that the Senate is ready to proceed to business.

NOTIFICATION TO THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of two members, be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. BAYARD and ANTHONY were appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. WHYTE, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be twelve o'clock m. until otherwise ordered.

RECESS.

Mr. WHYTE, (at twelve o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) I move that the Senate take a recess for half an hour.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at one o'clock p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

Mr. WHYTE. From information which I have received from the House of Representatives, I do not think it possible for the House to organize before three or half past three o'clock, and therefore I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 18, 1879.

The House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States, in compliance with the President's proclamation of the 4th day of March, 1879, convened this day in extra session; and, at twelve o'clock m., was called to order by Hon. GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk of the last House.

The CLERK. On the 4th day of the present month the following proclamation was issued by the President of the United States:

By the President of the United States.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas the final adjournment of the Forty-fifth Congress without making the usual and necessary appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and without making the usual and necessary appropriations for the support of the Army for the same fiscal year, presents an extraordinary occasion, requiring the President to exercise the power vested in him by the Constitution to convene the Houses of Congress in anticipation of the day fixed by law for their next meeting:

Now, therefore, I, Rutherford B. Hayes, President of the United States, do, by virtue of the power to this end in me vested by the Constitution, convene both Houses of Congress to assemble at their respective Chambers at twelve o'clock noon on Tuesday the 18th day of March instant, then and there to consider and determine such measures as, in their wisdom, their duty and the welfare of the people may seem to demand.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 4th day of March, A. D. 1879, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and third.

[SEAL.] R. B. HAYES.

By the President:

WM. M. EVARTS, Secretary of State.

Pending which, however, persons who are not entitled to the privileges of the floor are requested to retire from the Hall in order that the Representatives-elect may occupy the seats which are prepared for that purpose; and the Doorkeeper and the Sergeant-at-Arms will see to it that the rules of the House in this regard are rigidly enforced. After calling the names of the Representatives from Florida,

The CLERK said: In reference to the State of Florida, if there be no objection, the Clerk will state the reasons which controlled him in placing the name of Mr. Hull upon the roll as the Representative-elect from the second district. He received a certificate of election signed by the governor and authenticated by the seal of Florida, as prescribed by the following provision in the statutes of that State:

Whenever any person shall be elected to the office of elector of President or Vice-President, or Representative in Congress, the governor shall make out and sign and cause to be sealed with the seal of the State and transmit to such person a certificate of his election:

duly accrediting Mr. Hull as a Representative-elect to the Forty-sixth Congress. He subsequently received a number of papers, among which was a certified copy of a canvass of the votes in the second district of Florida, made by the board of State canvassers in pursuance of an order of the supreme court of that State, from which canvass it appears that Mr. Horatio Bisbee, jr., was elected, but those papers were not accompanied by the certificate of the governor, authenticated by the seal of the State, as required by the statute just cited.

The Clerk did not feel at liberty to regard anything as a credential within the meaning of the law governing him in making up the roll except a certificate made out and signed by the governor and sealed with the seal of the State, as prescribed by this provision of the statutes of Florida; and as Mr. Bisbee, who claims to have been elected, presented no such certificate, the Clerk could not regard him as possessing the prima facie evidence of an election which the law of Florida requires that he should have, and consequently omitted his name from the roll. As the credentials presented by Mr. Hull, however, did possess all the requisites prescribed by the law, the Clerk deemed it his duty to place his name upon the roll, and accordingly did so.

When the State of Iowa was reached and the Representatives from that State had been called,

The CLERK said: In reference to the State of Iowa, the Clerk also begs the indulgence of the Representatives-elect while he makes a statement as to the reasons by which he was controlled in placing upon the roll the names of the gentlemen he has just called as Representatives-elect from Iowa. There were presented to the Clerk certificates duly signed by the governor of the State of Iowa, under the seal of the State, accrediting the nine gentlemen whose names have been announced as Representatives duly elected on the 8th day of October, 1878. Sundry papers were also presented to the Clerk in reference to an election claimed to have been held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1878. These papers, however, do not conform to the requirements of the laws of Iowa. They are not signed by the governor; they are not under the seal of the State; they are simply papers which came unauthenticated and in no sense constitute credentials within the meaning of the laws of Iowa. Whatever may be the fact, therefore, in reference to the time at which the election should have been held in the State of Iowa, even though it were definitely and clearly settled that the election should have been held in November instead of October, the Clerk could not in any event place on the roll the names of those persons in whose behalf papers have been filed in reference to the November election for the reason that these papers do not comply with the laws of the State of Iowa and do not constitute credentials.

As to whether the election should have been held in October or in November, there are grave doubts in the minds of those learned in the law. It is a question about which he confesses he has not been able to arrive at so clear and satisfactory a conclusion as he could himself have desired. But in the discharge of the duty imposed upon him, unless he could arrive at a clear and satisfactory conclusion that those gentlemen were not elected on the proper day, he did not feel at liberty to withhold their names from the roll of members-elect, but thought it proper to give the benefit of the doubt in favor of representation, and to remand that question for the consideration of the House when it shall have organized.

When the State of Kansas was reached and the names called,

The CLERK said: The Clerk begs also to remark, with the permission and indulgence of the Representatives-elect, that he has received a certificate accrediting an additional Representative from the State of Kansas as elected from the State at large; but as he is not aware of any law authorizing that State to have more than three Representatives, he has not placed the name of the person who is claimed to have been elected for the State at large upon the roll.

The call of the roll having been completed, it was ascertained that all the members-elect had responded to their names except Mr. Daniel O'Reilly and Mr. Amaziah B. James, both of the State of New York.

The CLERK said: Two hundred and eighty-five Representatives-elect have responded to their names—more than a quorum—and the Clerk is now prepared to receive a motion looking to the organization of the House.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I rise to a privileged question. I move that the House now proceed to the election of a Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Forty-sixth Congress, and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

The CLERK. Under the order of the House just made the House will now proceed to the election of a Speaker by ballot, and the Clerk will receive nominations for the office of Speaker.

Mr. CLYMER. I place in nomination for the office of Speaker of the House for the Forty-sixth Congress the name of Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, a Representative-elect from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. FRYE. I place in nomination for the Speaker of the Forty-sixth Congress Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD, a member-elect from the State of Ohio.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I place in nomination Hon. HENDRICK B. WRIGHT, a member-elect from the State of Pennsylvania. [Applause in the galleries.]

The CLERK. If there are no further nominations, the Clerk announces that the nominees are:

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, a Representative-elect from the State of Pennsylvania;

Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD, a Representative-elect from the State of Ohio; and

Hon. HENDRICK B. WRIGHT, a Representative-elect from the State of Pennsylvania.

The Clerk will request Mr. CLYMER of Pennsylvania, Mr. ELLIS of Louisiana, Mr. HISCOCK of New York, and Mr. STONE of Michigan to act as tellers.

The tellers took their places at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. CONGER. I will move that the name of each member be called, and that upon the call of his name he announce his vote viva voce.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I second that motion.

The CLERK. That is the usual practice.

Mr. CONGER. I ask whether, without a special rule upon the subject, that practice will be pursued?

The CLERK. The Clerk was about to state to the gentleman from Michigan that that is the usual way in which the election of a Speaker is conducted, but that does not dispense with the necessity for tellers.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the vote be taken in that way.

The CLERK. Does the gentleman, in view of the fact that that is the way in which the vote will be taken, insist upon his motion? That is the rule of proceeding.

Mr. CONGER. I made the motion because the Clerk inadvertently stated that the election would be by ballot.

Mr. GARFIELD. The rule of the House is that the vote shall be taken viva voce.

The roll was then called, with the following result:

For Mr. Samuel J. Randall—143.

Barlow.

Mr. CLYMER, in behalf of the tellers appointed to conduct the vote, reported that the whole number of votes cast was 282, of which number Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL had received 143, Mr. JAMES A. GARFIELD 125, Mr. HENDRICK B. WRIGHT 13, and Mr. KELLEY 1.

The CLERK. The tellers report that the whole number of votes cast is 282, of which number Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, received 143 votes; Mr. GARFIELD, of Ohio, 125 votes; Mr. WRIGHT, of Pennsylvania, 13 votes; and Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, 1 vote.

Mr. CONGER. Before the final announcement of the result of the vote I wish to ask the Clerk what the rule is; whether it does not require a majority of all the members elected to this House to elect a Speaker under its rules?

Mr. SPRINGER. The majority of a quorum will elect at any time any officer whom the House might elect, and also transact any other business.

Mr. CONGER. I was addressing my inquiry to the Clerk.

Mr. O'REILLY. I ask that my name be called in order that I may vote for Speaker.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. O'REILLY, and he announced that he voted for Mr. RANDALL.

Mr. CONGER. The point I make is one which is made very frequently. I care nothing about it on the present occasion, except that this may not pass into precedent without being at least mentioned. My point is that unless there is a change of the rule it requires a majority of all the members of the House to elect a Speaker.

The CLERK. To what point does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] rise—merely to make an inquiry, or does he propose some action?

Mr. CONGER. I inquire of the Clerk whether it does not require a majority of all the members elected to this House to elect a Speaker?

The CLERK. The Clerk will state in response to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that it requires a majority of those voting to elect a Speaker, as it does to pass a bill. The rule requires that a quorum shall vote. That is the opinion of the Clerk.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I call for the regular order.

The CLERK. The regular order is the announcement of the result of the vote for Speaker, which is as follows: The whole number of votes cast was 283, of which SAMUEL J. RANDALL received 144, JAMES A. GARFIELD 125, HENDRICK B. WRIGHT 13, and WILLIAM D. KELLEY 1. Accordingly, SAMUEL J. RANDALL, one of the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, having received a majority of all the votes given for Speaker, is duly elected Speaker of the House of Representatives for the Forty-sixth Congress.

ADDRESS OF THE SPEAKER.

Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. BLACKBURN, having been named by the Clerk for that purpose, conducted Mr. RANDALL to the chair, when he addressed the House as follows:

REPRESENTATIVES: By your vote I am elevated for the third time to the exalted office of Speaker of this House. For this evidence of your approval and confidence I offer you my heartfelt thanks.

The responsibilities and duties imposed upon me are heavy and difficult. With the blessing of God I shall discharge them without personal bias or ignoble partisanship. Observing strict impartiality as to men, measures, parties, and sections, it will be to me unspeakable joy if I can help to bring about that substantial, fraternal union which comes alone through "wisdom, moderation, and justice."

This new Congress meets in its first session under the call of the President. Owing to irreconcilable differences upon vital issues, important and necessary appropriation bills failed to pass at the previous session. Then the political sentiment of the two Houses was antagonistic. It is now in complete accord. This House, fresh from the people, brings with it their latest will. We are here for such legislation as their necessities, welfare, and honor demand. That will, as expressed by the majority in calm and decorous form, let us hope will meet with universal acceptance. Moreover, the country expects of this Congress that it will wisely and deliberately legislate to remove the burdens that have too long weighed upon the patriotism and prosperity of the people. With the fervent hope that the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution shall be the controlling influence in directing such legislation, I am now prepared to take the oath of office.

Mr. KELLEY, having served longest continuously as a member of the House, was designated by the Clerk to administer to the Speaker-elect the oath prescribed; which was accordingly done.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that Mr. BAYARD and Mr. ANTHONY had been appointed a committee on the part of the Senate to join such committee as might be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of each House had assembled, and that Congress was ready to receive any communication he might be pleased to make.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER proceeded to administer to the members in attendance the oath of office. The members presented themselves as their names were called by States, and took respectively the test oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862, or the special oath provided in the act of July 11, 1868, for those whose disabilities under the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States have been removed by a vote of two-thirds of each House of Congress.

When the State of Florida was called,

Mr. FRYE said: I object to the administering of the oath to the gentleman from the second congressional district of the State of Florida, Mr. Hull, and ask that in conformity with usage, he stand aside for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will stand aside for the present.

SWEARING IN OF DELEGATES.

At the close of the swearing in of the members,

The SPEAKER said: The Clerk will now call the roll of Delegates elected to this House, and those who are present will be sworn in.

The roll of Delegates was called; and the following gentlemen came forward and were sworn in, taking the test oath of 1862:

Utah—George Q. Cannon.
Washington—Thomas H. Brents.
Dakota—G. G. Bennett.
Montana—Martin Maginnis.
Wyoming—S. W. Downey.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM FLORIDA.

The SPEAKER. The swearing in of a member is a privileged question, and unless it be waived——

Mr. FRYE. If there be no objection, I would prefer to bring up for consideration to-morrow the matter relating to the gentleman from Florida, Mr. Hull. I understand that that course will be agreeable to several gentlemen on the other side who desire to take part in the discussion.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. If that interferes with the right of the gentleman as a sitting member, I think the matter had better be disposed of at once.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Noble A. Hull be now sworn in as a Representative in this Congress from the second district of the State of Florida.

Mr. FRYE. As a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield for this purpose?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes, sir; and as so far as I am concerned I do not desire to debate the subject, I will call the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, no.

Mr. FRYE. We desire to debate it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the credentials upon which Noble A. Hull claims a seat in the Forty-sixth Congress from the second congressional district of the State of Florida have been annulled and made void by the judgment of the supreme court of that State; and

Whereas, in pursuance and in compliance with such judgment and with the laws of said State, the State board of canvassers of Florida have determined, declared, and certified that Horatio Bisbee, jr., is duly elected a Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America from the second congressional district of the State of Florida: Therefore,

Resolved, That Horatio Bisbee, jr., is entitled to be sworn in as a member of this House on his prima facie case.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not demand the previous question. This is a matter which we on this side of the House desire to discuss.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I insist on the demand for the previous question. There will be one hour for debate after the previous question is seconded.

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, no. This is not the report of a committee. Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted that this new House just assembled will be willing to hear a statement (if the gentleman from Maine has one to present) to the effect that the credentials of Mr. Hull have been invalidated by the authority of the supreme court of the State. If such a statement were true, this House, I take it, would not be willing that a man should be sworn in on an invalidated credential. I say this without anticipating the ground which the gentleman from Maine may take.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I have always found that time is economized by assenting somewhat to the views of the minority. As in this case they desire a short time to discuss the question, I think it will economize time and give more satisfaction to allow a limited discussion. Therefore I would like to hear from gentlemen on the other side what time they desire.

Mr. FRYE. I should very much prefer that the matter go over until to-morrow, without prejudice to the right of the sitting member to participate in the drawing of seats. This was the course pursued two years ago, in the case from Colorado and other cases, where objection was made to gentlemen being sworn in. We might allow Mr. Hull the right to participate by proxy in the drawing of seats, so that he could not be subjected to injustice in any possible event. I hope that the gentleman from Virginia will consent to allow this question to go over until to-morrow and then permit at least two hours' discussion, one hour on each side.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. While it may not be agreeable to some of my friends on our side of the House, I think time will be saved and the rights of all parties best observed by agreeing to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine. So far as I am concerned, I agree to it.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the further consideration of the resolution and the substitute will be postponed until to-morrow.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the credentials and all the papers that have been presented to the Clerk in this case may be printed in the RECORD, so that members may have them in print to-morrow when the question is voted upon.

Mr. COX. How many of these papers are there? They may make a whole volume.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think they are not voluminous. The Clerk himself mentioned that he had received certain papers.

Mr. COX. There may be a volume of testimony.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask that the judgment record and the opinions of the court be printed.

Mr. COX. There is no objection to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that the papers in the hands of the Clerk are not voluminous. It would be convenient to all members of the House to have in print to-morrow everything bearing directly and particularly upon this subject. I ask that all the papers—the certificate of the governor, the judgment of the court, and all the papers, whatever they may be—be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the request is to have printed in the RECORD the certificate of the governor, the subsequent opinion of the attorney-general, and the judgment of the court.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly; and the certificate of the board of canvassers.

Mr. HISCOCK. And the opinions of the court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is there objection to having these papers printed?

Mr. CONGER. I ask, then, that the papers may be read.

The SPEAKER. The matter has gone over until to-morrow.

Mr. MORRISON. At the request of members around me I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] withdraws his objection; and the papers indicated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COX. The papers on both sides?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The agreement, as the Chair understands, is that all the papers be printed except such as may be of the character of testimony.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not ask for the printing of any testimony; merely the official papers proper.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the order to print will be made.

There was no objection.

The following are the papers:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Tallahassee, Florida.

I, George F. Drew, governor of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that at an election held on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1878, in the several counties of the State of Florida composing the second congressional district of said State for Representative in the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America, under an act to provide for the registration of electors and the holding of elections, approved August 6, 1868, and acts amendatory thereto, Noble A. Hull, of the county of Orange, in said State, received a majority of all the votes cast for Representative in the Forty-sixth Congress from the second congressional district of the State of Florida, and was duly elected to be such Representative, as fully appears from a certificate of the State board of canvassers, made under the laws of said State and now on file in the office of secretary of state of said State of Florida.

In testimony whereof I hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of Florida to be affixed, at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 23d day of December, A. D. 1878, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and third year.

GEORGE F. DREW,
Governor of the State of Florida.

By the Governor.
Attest:

W. D. BLOXHAM,
Secretary of State of the State of Florida.

The State of Florida, to William D. Bloxham, secretary of state, George P. Raney, attorney-general, and Columbus Drew, comptroller, members of the board of canvassers of Florida, and to every of them, greeting:

Whereas it has been suggested to us by the petition of Horatio Bisbee, jr., that a general election was held in the State of Florida on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1878, for the election, among other officers, of Representatives to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America; that the petitioner, Horatio Bisbee, jr., is a citizen and resident of Duval County, in said State, and was one of the candidates for Representative to Congress from the second congressional district of said State to be voted for by the voters of said district, and Noble A. Hull was the only other candidate to be voted for for such Representative from said district; that by the bona fide and true returns of votes cast at said election received at the office of secretary of state, as provided by law, the whole number of votes cast at said election for your petitioner for such Representative was 10,779, and the whole number of votes cast at said election for the said Noble A. Hull for such Representative was 10,577; that on the 10th day of December, in the year aforesaid, George P. Raney, the attorney-general of Florida, William D. Bloxham, secretary of state, and Columbus Drew, comptroller of public accounts, constituting the board of State canvassers of returns of elections in said State, convened and organized as such board at the office of the secretary of state to canvass the returns of said election and determine and declare who had been elected Representative to Congress as shown by the bona fide and true returns of votes cast at said election on file in the office of the secretary of state; that upon so organizing the said board proceeded to canvass such returns of elections, and in making such canvass the said board did improperly and wrongfully reject a bona fide return of votes cast in the county of Madison, in said congressional district, and in the exercise of pretended power not conferred upon said board by law did refuse to include in their declaration of the result of said election for such Representative to said Congress the said return of votes cast in Madison County.

That it clearly appears from said return from Madison County that the petitioner received at said election in said county 1,151 votes for Representative in Congress, and said Noble A. Hull received 938 votes for Representative in said Congress, and by the action of said board rejecting and not canvassing said return petitioner is prevented from receiving a certificate, to which he is entitled, certifying that he has been duly elected to the Forty-sixth Congress from the second congressional district of Florida. Whereas if said board of canvassers had counted and included said return in their declaration of said result it would manifestly appear that petitioner had been elected Representative to said Congress.

That said return of votes cast at the said election in Madison County was duly signed by the county canvassers, and that it truly sets forth and contains the vote actually cast at said election in said county for said candidate, as shown by all the precinct returns from established precincts in said county delivered or filed by the inspectors of election at such precincts to the clerk of the circuit court of said county, and to the county judge of said county, or to either of them, and the said board of State canvassers do not deny that the said county canvassers performed their full duty and made a true return of all the votes cast in said county for Representative to Congress in strict accordance with the law, as shown by all the precinct returns aforesaid delivered or filed by the inspectors of election with the said clerk and county judge at the time said county canvassers met and made their canvass and return pursuant to law.

That said board of canvassers rejected and refused to count said return and include it in their declaration of the said result solely and exclusively upon the ground that it was shown, by papers before said board other than said return, that from one of the voting precincts in said county no return of the votes cast thereat was ever delivered or filed by the inspectors at said precinct, or by any other person, either to the clerk of the circuit court of said county or to the county judge of said county, and that the county canvassers of said county consequently did not have before them when they made their canvass, which was on the last day specified by law for making the same, nor within their power or control, a return or paper purporting to be a return of votes cast at any election at said precinct; which said precinct is known as precinct or district No. 4 in said county.

That no return of an election at said precinct has to this day and time been delivered to the said clerk's office or county judge's office, and that it has not at any time since said election been within the power of said county canvassers to make any other or different return of votes cast in said county at said election than the one so rejected as aforesaid by the said board of State canvassers; and the said board of State canvassers admit that the said county canvassing board performed their duty under the law and made a correct canvass and return of all the votes cast at said election in said county, as shown by all the precinct returns before them as aforesaid, all of which will fully appear by a copy of the certificate of said board of State canvassers, showing their action and the ground of their action in the premises, which is herewith filed and marked "Exhibit A."

That the petitioner is informed, and upon information and belief avers, that at said precinct 186 votes were cast for petitioner and 129 votes were cast for Noble A. Hull for such Representative.

And whereas the said Horatio Bisbee, jr., prays for a peremptory writ of mandamus from this court directed to the members of said State canvassing board, and to each of them, commanding them forthwith to reconvene and assemble as such board of State canvassers, at the office of secretary of state, and to canvass the said return of votes cast at the said election in Madison County for said candidates, and include the said return in their declaration of the result of said election for Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States, as shown by such bona fide and true returns of votes cast at said election; and to make and sign, as required by law, a certificate containing in words written at full length the whole number of votes given at said election, as shown by the said returns for the office of Representative to the said Congress from the second congressional district of Florida, and in said certificate declare the result of said election for such Representative to said Congress, and that such other order may be had in the premises as justice may require.

Now, therefore, we being willing that full and speedy justice should be done in the premises, do command you, William D. Bloxham, secretary of state, and you, George P. Raney, attorney-general, and you, Columbus Drew, comptroller, that you meet forthwith and convene and reassemble as a board of State canvassers in the office of the secretary of state to canvass and count the true and bona fide returns of the election on file in the said office of the secretary of state from the second congressional district of Florida of the said election for the office of Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress, held on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1878; and especially that you do canvass and count the return of the said election from Madison County, and include said return in your declaration of the result of said election for Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States, as shown by such bona fide and true returns of votes cast at said election; and to make and sign, as required by law, a certificate containing in words written at full length the whole number of votes given at said election as shown by the said bona fide and true returns for the office of Representative to the said Congress from the second congressional district of Florida, and in said certificate declare the result of said election for such Representative to said Congress.

And that you do perfectly execute this writ on this the 8th day of January, A. D. 1879, and how you shall have executed it make return to our supreme court on said day by four o'clock p. m., in writing, to be filed in the clerk's office of said court.

Witness the honorable E. M. Randall, chief-justice of the supreme court of Florida, this 8th day of January, A. D. 1879, at the capital at Tallahassee, Florida, and the seal of said court.

[SEAL.] CHAS. H. FOSTER, Clerk.

Supreme court, special term, A. D. 1879.

State ex rel. Bisbee
vs.
State Canvassing Board.

We have the honor to certify that we have performed the requirements of the peremptory writ of mandamus issued in this cause.

January 8, 1879.

GEO. P. RANEY,
Attorney-General.

I, Charles H. Foster, clerk of said supreme court, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a correct copy of the original peremptory writ of mandamus issued in the above-entitled cause by this court aforesaid.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and the seal of said court this 6th day of March, A. D. 1879.

[SEAL.] CHAS. H. FOSTER, Clerk.

[Indorsement:] Supreme court, State of Florida. The State of Florida ex rel. Horatio Bisbee, jr., vs. Wm. D. Bloxham, secretary of state, et al. Peremptory writ and answer of respondents. (Copy.) Filed January 8, A. D. 1879. C. H. Foster, Clerk.

Supreme court, special term, January, 1879.

The State of Florida, ex rel. Horatio Bisbee, jr.,
vs.
W. D. Bloxham, secretary of state, and others constituting the State canvassing board.
} Mandamus.

The alternative writ sets up the facts that he was a citizen of the State of Florida and one of the candidates for Representative in Congress at an election held in the second congressional district on the 5th day of November, 1878, and received a majority of the votes actually cast and duly returned to the board of State canvassers.

That on the 10th day of December, 1878, the said respondents as a board of State canvassers organized and proceeded to canvass the returns of said election, and that they did improperly reject a bona fide return of votes cast in Madison County and refused to include in their said canvass the entire return of votes from said county on the ground that there was no return made from one precinct in said county to the county board of votes cast in such precinct, and such votes were not included in the return made by the county canvassers to the State board, and that by so rejecting the county returns of Madison County the relator was deprived of a certificate of election to which he would have been entitled if such returns had not been so rejected. He therefore demands that the State board be required to convene and canvass and count all the bona fide returns of said election, including those from Madison, and declare and certify the result and perform such other duties as are required by law in the premises.

The respondents filed their demurrer to the alternative writ upon the following grounds:

1. It does not show that the relator is twenty-five years of age.
2. There was not nor is there any statute or law of the State of Florida providing for the election of a Representative in Congress from the second congressional district of said State.
3. The said writ shows that the said return from Madison County does not show or represent the true vote cast in said county at said election. (Opinion, Randall, C. J.)

Upon the first ground of demurrer, that the relator is not shown by the alternative writ to be twenty-five years of age, we remark that the title to the office not being by any possibility liable to be controverted in a proceeding of this character, any peculiar qualification prescribed by the Constitution of the United States for members of Congress can be tried only by the Congress. This proceeding seeks only to procure such certificate as the candidate voted for may be entitled to under the laws of this State, which certificate is a property which the person obtaining the most votes is authorized by law to demand. Upon this inquiry the right to take and hold the office is not in question, and a slight examination of the rules laid down in the books does not show that such a question has ever been entertained by the courts. Whether the relator possesses all the qualifications necessary to entitle him to a seat in Congress is a matter that can only be inquired into by the House in which he may present a certificate of election.

The relator shows in the pleadings that he is a citizen of this State and was voted for at the last general election for Representative in Congress from the second district, and that he received a majority of votes actually cast and duly returned, and that such votes have not been counted in full, so that a certificate of election is withheld from him. If all this is true no person other than himself is entitled to the certificate of election, and whether the one or the other is entitled to the seat cannot be tried before a State court. The question raised, therefore, by the first ground of demurrer is not material in this court. Were this a proceeding under a writ of quo warranto to test the right to a State office the question of eligibility would be material The first ground of demurrer is not sustained.

The second ground of demurrer was abandoned upon the hearing. We proceed then to consider the third ground of demurrer, involving the only material question before us.

We do not find anywhere in the opinion or judgment of this court in the case of Drew, relator, against the State canvassers, (16 Fla., 17,) or in any other case decided by this court, any expression which will warrant the exclusion by the State board of a return which is regular, genuine, and bona fide, merely because the board are informed and satisfied that votes cast at a precinct (of which no return was made to the county board) were not included in the return made by county canvassers to the State board. The power of this board "is limited" (as is expressly stated in the opinion of the court in that case) "by the express words of the statute which gives them being to the signing of a certificate containing the whole number of votes given for each person for each office, and therein declaring the result as shown by the returns." The judgment of the board may be invoked to lay aside a county return and omit to include it in the statement and determination of the result of the election when it shall appear to them that the return is "so irregular, false, and fraudulent" that it does not show the true vote, but does represent votes not cast according to the precinct returns made to them; or, in other words, that the return in the hands of the State board is not made up in good faith from such precinct returns, but is a thing manufactured, an attempted imposition upon the board, or of such character that it represents falsehood instead of the truth as to the precinct returns of votes actually cast, and is for such reasons not a lawful return of an election.

In the case referred to the court says: "The words 'the true vote' used in the statute indicate the vote actually cast as distinct from the legal vote." The court was considering whether the power of the board to dissect returns and reject such votes as may have been illegally cast was included in the language of the statute, and it was decided that they had no such power under the statute, and that the power given was confined to a determination as to the character of the return—whether it was regular, genuine, bona fide, a true or false compilation of precinct returns. This power was deemed incident to the character of the office of the canvassers as created and defined by law for the protection of the board and the people from the effect of unlawful attempts to palm off upon them forged and "doctored" papers or wholesale falsehoods. To maintain under our statute that a county canvass based upon votes not cast is a proper return to be counted is clearly erroneous.

Is this the character of the return from Madison? Does the return made by the county canvassers of that county bear any of the characteristics that place it among returns that the State board may exclude? Does it include any votes but those actually cast according to the precinct returns? Is it false as to those returns?

It is not pretended that the county canvassers of Madison County have violated the letter or the spirit of the law, nor that the return made by them is "irregular or fraudulent" within the meaning of the statute, but that it is false.

The ninth section of chapter 3021, (Laws of 1877,) amending the twenty-fourth section of the act of 1868, provides that "on the sixth day after any election, or sooner if the returns shall have been received, it shall be the duty of the county judge and clerk of the circuit court to meet at the office of the said clerk and to take to their assistance a justice of the peace of the county, * * * and they shall publicly proceed to canvass the votes given for the several officers and persons as shown by the returns on file in the office of said judge and clerk respectively. Such canvass shall be made solely and entirely from the returns of the precinct inspectors in each election district as filed by them with the county judge and clerk of the circuit court respectively; and in no case shall the board of county canvassers change or vary in any manner the number of votes cast for the candidates respectively at any of the polling places or precincts in the county as shown by the returns of the inspectors of such polling places or precincts. They shall compile the result of the election as shown by said inspectors' returns, and shall then make up and sign duplicate certificates, containing in words and figures, written at full length, the whole number of votes given for each office, the names of persons for whom such votes were given for each office, and the number of votes given to each person for such office. Such certificate shall be recorded by the clerk in a book to be kept by him for that purpose, and one of such certificates shall be immediately transmitted by mail to the secretary of state and the other to the governor of the State."

The fourth section of chapter 1868 (Laws of 1872) requires the State board of canvassers to "proceed to canvass the returns of said election, and determine and declare who shall have been elected to any such office or as such member, as shown by such returns," unless the returns are shown to their satisfaction to be vicious, as before stated.

Now, the county canvassers of Madison County have fully and honestly complied with the law. They canvassed and certified all the votes returned to the judge and clerk in due form of law.

The statute required them to perform their duty within a certain time, and they performed it. If precinct inspectors failed to return votes from their precinct, still the county canvassers lawfully proceeded without it. The State canvassers "may be authorized by the Legislature (as is said in the Drew case) to inquire into the truth or falsity of the returns sent to them, and if, upon such inquiry, they be satisfied that the return does not show the vote actually cast at the election, but states a falsehood as to that fact, they may lay it aside and refuse to count the return, as is provided in the act of 1872."

The county canvassers of Madison County made a return that contains only the truth and not falsehood. There is no allegation that they made other than a truthful, legal canvass and return of all the votes cast in the county and duly returned to them, and their returns to the State board are regular and intelligible, according to the pleadings in this case.

It was urged in the argument that if there should be in a given county a large number of precincts, and it should happen that the returns of one poll only should reach the county canvassers, and this return only canvassed and returned to the State board, it would be absurd to treat this single poll as the true vote of the county.

It may be that this state of things being made to appear, the State board might well consider that there had been improper conduct on the part of precinct inspectors or messengers, as they would know that the entire vote of the county had not been given to the county board. We will not here instruct them as to their duty in such an extreme case. We submit, however, that because one or more precincts may be disfranchised temporarily by rascality or accident, it does not follow that the residue of the voters of the county should be legally treated in the same manner.

Whether the returns not made would produce a different result of the election, could scarcely be determined by a canvassing board, and parties interested would doubtless seek a remedy.

Suppose that at the close of the election at any polling place it should be ascertained that there were one or more ballots found in the box more than there were names on the poll-lists, and the inspectors, under the law, draw out and destroy a number of ballots equal to the excess, so that the list and the ballots agree in number, and a return is made of the result, excluding the votes so drawn out and destroyed; yet it may be proved that these ballots were "actually cast." On this showing, would the returns give the vote "actually cast?" I think it would, though it did not show the entire vote cast. The votes returned were votes actually cast, and the return does not state a falsehood, is not irregular nor a fraud, because it is a lawful return. Yet this return is precisely as false as the return from Madison County, and with the same propriety should be rejected.

Neither should be rejected, because they are true and according to law.

Under the law and the rules heretofore announced by this court upon the subject, the State board can investigate the good faith and regularity of the action of the county board and their certificate, when these are challenged, for their own protection and that of the public, and the proper exercise of this power is the only protection against imposition.

The omission of the inspectors of a precinct or polling place to make a return to the county board may occasion inconvenience to parties interested in the vote in a contest before a tribunal competent to hear and decide the right to an office, but it is assuredly not the basis of the imputation of fraud or falsehood against the county returns or the county board.

Under the circumstances, and in view of the decision of this court in the case of Drew, relator, against the State Board, the election return from Madison County does not come "under the condemnation" of that decision.

What the court might say if it was alleged by the respondents that a portion of the returns received by the county board from the precincts had been without cause or arbitrarily suppressed, may not be appropriate to this case, for no such charge is made. But for myself I feel bound to say that, in my judgment, the returns made to the State board in 1876 from the county of Clay should have been counted by the board, and had an application been made at the moment looking to that end, I should have voted in favor of it. The court, in its opinion on that question, said: "The answer states that 35 votes were added (by the State board) upon the ground that said votes had been improperly rejected by the county canvassers of the vote of said county at said election, and that 6 votes were deducted upon the ground that said votes were cast by non-residents of the county. It follows, from the view we have taken of the law applicable to the powers and duties of the State canvassers, that any statement of votes by precinct inspectors, which were not included in the canvass made by the canvassing board, cannot be counted by the State board, the powers of the latter being confined by law to counting only such votes as are duly returned by the county board."

I understood then as now, that this was a sufficient indication to the State board that the returns from Clay, so far as they gave evidence of "actual votes," should be counted, there being no alleged evidence of fraud or falsehood as to the returns so made by the county board; but that the precinct return had been omitted by that board in making the county canvass solely (yet probably honestly) upon insufficient grounds.

The State board had at first included the Clay County returns in their canvass, embracing not only the votes regularly returned, but also the votes mentioned in the precinct return which the county board had omitted to include in their formal return to the State board.

The comments of the court, referring to the Clay County return, condemned the action of the State board in including the 35 votes from the rejected precinct returns, and the court said they could not be counted by the State board, their powers being confined by law to counting only such votes as are duly returned. It strikes me that if the opinion of the court had been that the regular return of votes from Clay County could not be counted by reason of the omission to include the precinct votes mentioned, the court would have so expressed itself, which it did not do, but used the language above quoted. But the returns from Madison County are not in the same condition. The canvassing board of Madison counted and duly certified to the State board all the returns made to them; the law above cited required them to do so without reference to returns they did not have, and the law required the State board to count such unimpeached returns.

The demurrer of the respondent is overruled.

I, Charles H. Foster, clerk of the said supreme court of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing seven pages (of which a part of page 5 and page 6 and part of page 7 are in print) contain a true copy of the original opinion of said court, filed in my office on the 7th day of January, A. D. 1879.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and the seal of the said court, this 7th day of March, A. D. 1879.

We, William D. Bloxham, secretary of state of the State of Florida, Columbus Drew, comptroller of said State, and George P. Raney, attorney-general of the State aforesaid, do hereby certify that we met at the office of the secretary of state at the capitol, in the city of Tallahassee, on the 8th day of January, A. D. 1879, and proceeded to canvass the returns of the general election held in said State on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1878, for Representative of the said State of Florida in the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America, from the second congressional district of said State of Florida, from which canvass we certify as follows:

In Suwannee County: The whole number of votes cast for Representative in Congress for the second congressional district was 1,094, of which Horatio Bisbee, jr., received 553 votes, Noble A. Hull received 540 votes, and Chandler H. Smith received 1 vote.

In Duval County: The whole number of votes cast for Representative in Congress from the second congressional district was 3,344, of which Horatio Bisbee, jr., received 2,214 votes, Noble A. Hull received 1,130 votes.

In Orange County: The whole number of votes cast for Representative in Congress from the second congressional district was 1,041, of which Noble A. Hull received 823 votes and Horatio Bisbee, jr., received 218 votes.

In Dade County: The whole number of votes cast for Representative in Congress from the second congressional district was 61, of which Noble A. Hull received 47 votes and Horatio Bisbee, jr., received 14 votes.

In Madison County: The whole number of votes cast for Representative in Congress from the second congressional district was 2,089, of which Noble A. Hull received 938 votes and Horatio Bisbee, jr., received 1,151 votes.

From which canvass it appears that the whole number of votes cast for Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America from the second congressional district of the State of Florida was 21,358, of which Noble A. Hull received 10,578 votes, Horatio Bisbee, jr., received 10,779 votes, and Chandler H. Smith received 1 vote.

Wherefore it is determined and declared that Horatio Bisbee, jr., is duly elected Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America from the second congressional district of the State of Florida, as shown by such returns.

And the said board of State canvassers having canvassed the election returns of Madison County of the general election held on November 5, 1878, certify that the whole number of votes cast for State senator was 2,087, of which Enoch J. Vann received 943 votes and Dennis Eagan received 1,144.

Wherefore it is determined and declared that Dennis Eagan is duly elected State senator from the tenth senatorial district.

The whole number of votes cast for members of the assembly was six thousand two hundred and forty, (6,240,) of which John B. Marshall received nine hundred and forty-two (942) votes, Daniel C. Barker received nine hundred and thirty-two (932) votes, Thomas J. Blalock received nine hundred and twenty-three (923) votes, E. J. Alexander received eleven hundred and fifty-two (1,152) votes, A. B. Osgood received eleven hundred and fifty-four (1,154,) and B. F. Tidwell received eleven hundred and thirty-seven (1,137) votes. Wherefore it is determined and declared that E. J. Alexander, A. B. Osgood, and B. F. Tidwell are duly elected members of the assembly from said county of Madison.

We further certify that the above canvass is made in accordance with the decision of the supreme court of Florida in the case of the State ex rel. Horatio Bisbee against Board of State canvassers. We further certify that the return from Brevard County, in so far as it relates to or represents the vote for member of Congress cast in that county, was laid aside and not included in the above canvass and declaration for the reasons stated in a separate certificate filed in the secretary of state's office and signed by us, bearing date December 23, 1878.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Office Secretary of State, ss:

I, W. D. Bloxham, secretary of state, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a correct transcript of the original now on file in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida at Tallahassee, the capital, this 13th day of January, A. D. 1879.

[SEAL.]

W. D. BLOXHAM,
Secretary of State.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Tallahassee, Florida, January 10, 1879.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of yesterday, asking for my legal opinion as to your official duty in the matter of the application of Hon. H. Bisbee, jr., for a certificate of election as Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States from the second district of Florida. The facts of the case are, that by the canvass of the returns from this district, concluded by the State board of canvassers on the 21st day of December, A. D. 1878, as shown by the certificate of the board of that date in the office of the secretary of state, Hon. Noble A. Hull was declared elected as such Representative. This certificate of the board shows that, according to that canvass, Mr. Hull received the majority of votes, he receiving 9,640 votes and Mr. Bisbee receiving 9,628 votes; and it also shows that the returns from Madison and Brevard Counties were laid aside by the board and not included in the canvass because the board found that they did not represent the "true vote" cast in such counties. After this canvass and certificate were made you issued a certificate of election to Mr. Hull, under section 30 of chapter 1625 of the laws of Florida. After this a proceeding was commenced by Mr. Bisbee in the supreme court, by writ of mandamus, to test the legality of the board's action in ejecting the return from Madison County; and the court decided that the board erred in rejecting this return, and ordered the board to reassemble and canvass the true and bona fide returns on file in the office of secretary of state, and to include and count in such canvass and in the declaration of the result of the election the return from Madison County; and to make and sign a certificate, as required by law, containing in words written at full length the whole number of votes given at such election, as shown by such bona fide and true returns, for Representative to such Congress, and to declare the result of such election.

Pursuant to such decision and order the board reassembled on the 8th instant and canvassed the returns, including that of Madison County, but not that of Brevard, this return being rejected by the board, as shown by the certificate, because it did not represent the "true vote" cast in that county. The certificate of this canvass on file in the secretary of state's office shows that Mr. Bisbee received 10,779 votes and Mr. Hull received 10,578 votes; and declares that Mr. Bisbee was elected.

You, therefore, have before you two certificates in so far as the election for Representative to Congress from the second district is concerned. The last has been made under and is in accordance with the decision of the highest court in the State as to the return from Madison County. The action of the board in rejecting the Brevard return and counting the other returns in each canvass by the board has not been questioned by legal proceedings, and should, in my opinion, be held as proper in so far as your duties in the premises are concerned, until it has been reversed by a competent court. The statute contemplates that you should give a certificate to the person, whom the canvass of the board shows entitled to it; and as between the two canvasses made by the board, the one made on the 8th day of January should, in my opinion, be regarded as the legal canvass. Any officer should hesitate to refuse to conform his action to the decision of the supreme court of his State. This decision has settled the right of Mr. Bisbee to the certificate made by the board; and thus, also, directed the formation of the basis to which you are to look for guidance in your action. The fact that you issued a certificate to Mr. Hull on the former canvass, before the court had convened, should not, to my mind, prevent you from issuing one on the second canvass to Mr. Bisbee. A recital in the one you may issue Mr. Bisbee should, in justice to yourself, state the facts of the case set forth above.

The duty devolved upon you is plainly ministerial; there is nothing properly resting in executive discretion. It is true that some supreme courts have decided that the judiciary would have no right to issue a mandamus compelling you to issue the certificate, and others have decided the contrary; but the question of your duty is not settled by the power of the courts to interfere in the matter. The supreme court of Georgia, in a case somewhat similar, except that there had not been a legal ascertainment of the relator's right to the office as there has been of Mr. Bisbee's right in this case to the last canvass and declaration made by the board, adopted the view of non-interference, basing it upon political reasons, but said:

"The framers of the constitution, doubtless, never anticipated that the executive officer of the government, whose sworn duty it is to cause justice to be executed according to law, would ever refuse to comply with the law when authoritatively adjudicated by the proper department of the government. In England, as we have already seen, when a right is claimed by the subject as against the Crown, the King is sued in the respectful form of a petition, and he never fails to comply with the judgment of his court. In the monarchical government of Great Britain, when the subject appeals to the courts of justice for his legal rights as against the Crown and the judgment is in favor of the subject and against the right claimed by the Crown, the King does not feel, it would seem, 'an involuntary shudder, as if, at the near approach of grasping power, the judiciary was about to plant its iron heel upon a prostrate constitution,' but always manifests his respect for the laws of his kingdom by invariably complying with the judgments of his courts. Such being the established course of the executive department of the government in Great Britain, we cannot and we will not presume that the chief magistrate of a republican State would for one moment hesitate to issue a commission to the relator when his right and title to the office shall be established by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction. To presume that the executive officer of the government would withhold the commission from one who had been judicially declared by a court of competent jurisdiction legally elected to the office would be to say, in the language of this court in Bonner vs. Pitts, that such officer was above the laws of the people; that he had the right to exercise despotic power, regardless of the laws of the people; and, in the language of Chief-Justice Marshall, at his discretion sport away the vested rights of individuals secured and protected by the laws of the land."

Mr. Bisbee's right to the certificate from you is legally consequent upon his right to the certificate and declaration made by the board.

Yours, very respectfully,

GEO. P. RANEY,
Attorney-General.

Hon. GEORGE F. DREW,
Governor of Florida.

I do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy from the records of the office of the attorney-general of the State of Florida.

G. P. RANEY,
Attorney-General.

TALLAHASSEE, FLORIDA, January 30, 1879.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Tallahassee, Florida, January 14, 1879.

SIR: In reply to your several communications upon the subject, and in accordance with my promise of the 11th instant, I have to say, that under existing circumstances it will be impossible for me to issue to you a certificate of election as member of Congress from the State of Florida to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America. I have some time since issued and signed a certificate for another person to that position, and I have no power to revoke the former certificate.

If you are entitled to a seat in the Forty-sixth Congress, it is for that body to decide.

This conclusion was reached after careful consideration and after consultation with some of the ablest lawyers in the State.

Very respectfully,

GEO. F. DREW.

To Hon. HORATIO BISBEE, JR.

ELECTION OF CLERK, SERGEANT-AT-ARMS, ETC.

Mr. CLYMER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That Hon. George M. Adams, a citizen of the State of Kentucky, be, and is hereby, elected Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress; that John G. Thompson, of the State of Ohio, be, and is hereby, elected Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress; that Charles W. Field, of the State of Georgia, be, and is hereby, elected Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress; that James M. Steuart, of the State of Virginia, be, and is hereby, elected Postmaster of the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress; and that Rev. W. P. Harrison, of the District of Columbia, be, and is hereby, elected Chaplain of the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. FRYE. I submit the following amendment:

Amend resolution by striking out that portion naming candidates, with the respective offices to which they are nominated, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

For Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress, Joseph H. Rainey, of South Carolina.
For Sergeant-at-Arms, Jeremiah M. Rusk, of Wisconsin.
For Doorkeeper, James M. Melton, of Tennessee.
For Postmaster, Henry Sherwood, of Michigan.
For Chaplain, Rev. Henry R. Nailor.

Mr. WEAVER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out that portion naming the candidates, with the respective offices to which they are nominated, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

For Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress, Lee Crandall, of Alabama.
For Sergeant-at-Arms, Charles Brouse, of Indiana.
For Doorkeeper, Benjamin E. Green, of Georgia.
For Postmaster, D. P. Mitchell, of Kansas.

Mr. CLYMER. I demand the previous question.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend the original proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania by striking out the name of Rev. W. P. Harrison and inserting in lieu thereof the name of Rev. Henry R. Nailor, of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MILLS. That amendment has already been moved.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the previous question.

Mr. PRICE. My object, Mr. Speaker, is to amend the original proposition and have the vote first taken on that amendment, because if adopted it may change the vote on the substitute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for that purpose?

Mr. CLYMER. I do not.

Mr. FRYE. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania had better consent, or otherwise it seems to me under the rule we may demand a separate vote on each one of these offices, and in that way the gentleman from Iowa could reach his object.

Mr. CLYMER. For the purpose of saving time I withdraw the objection.

Mr. FRYE. This will save time undoubtedly.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first put upon the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa as an amendment to the original proposition.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 122, noes 144.

So Mr. PRICE's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLYMER. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question recurred on Mr. WEAVER's amendment to the amendment.

The House divided; and there were ayes 7, noes not counted.

So Mr. WEAVER's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. FRYE.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 119, noes 145.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLYMER's resolution was then adopted.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The officers just elected presented themselves at the Speaker's desk and were duly qualified, Mr. ADAMS and Mr. THOMPSON taking the test oath, and Mr. FIELD, Mr. STEUART, and Mr. HARRISON the modified oath.

NOTIFICATION TO SENATE.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform that body that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and that SAMUEL J. RANDALL, one of the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, has been chosen Speaker, and GEORGE M. ADAMS, a citizen of the State of Kentucky, Clerk, and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. BLACKBURN submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

The SPEAKER appointed as such committee Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. GARFIELD, and Mr. BRIGHT.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have a resolution to present and I ask the Speaker to appoint some other person in my place.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. GOODE, of Virginia, in the place of Mr. BRIGHT.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the following resolution and ask that it be read and printed in the RECORD. I give notice that I will call it up to-morrow.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the last House of Representatives shall be the rules of this House until otherwise ordered, with the following amendments thereto, namely:

Rule 76 shall be amended so as to read as follows:

76. It shall be the duty of the following committees to take into consideration all executive communications and such other propositions as may be presented and referred to them by the House, namely:

The Committee on Appropriations, matters relating to the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, and for sundry civil expenses of the Government, except matters relating to the Department of Agriculture, which shall be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, matters relating to consular and diplomatic expenses.

The Committee on Military Affairs, matters relating to the expenses of the Army and of the Military Academy, and for fortifications.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, matters relating to the expenses of the Navy and the Naval Academy.

The Committee on Indian Affairs, matters relating to the expenses of the Indian department.

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, matters relating to the expenses of the Post-Office Department and for mail transportation by ocean steamers.

In preparing bills of appropriations for other objects said committees shall not include appropriations for carrying into effect treaties made by the United States; and where appropriation bills shall be referred to any of the foregoing committees for their consideration which contain appropriations for carrying a treaty into effect, and for other objects, they shall propose such amendments as shall prevent appropriations for carrying a treaty into effect being included in the same bill with appropriations for other objects.

Rule 77 shall be amended so as to read as follows:

77. It shall be the duty of the several committees mentioned in Rule 76, within thirty days after their appointment at every session of Congress commencing on the first Monday of December, to report the general appropriation bills, namely:

The Committee on Appropriations, bills for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for all deficiencies, and for sundry civil expenses.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, the bill for the consular and diplomatic expenses.

The Committee on Military Affairs, the bills for the expenses of the Army and of the Military Academy and for fortifications.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill for the expenses of the Navy and the Naval Academy.

The Committee on Indian Affairs, the bill for the expenses of the Indian department.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, the bill for the payment of invalid and other pensions.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, the bills for the expenses of the Post-Office Department and for mail transportation by ocean steamers.

The Committee on Agriculture, the bill for the expenses of the Department of Agriculture.

In case any of said committees shall fail to make such report within said time they shall report the reasons of such failure. And said committees shall have leave to report said bills (for reference only) at any time. In all cases where appropriations cannot be made specific in amount the maximum to be expended shall be stated, and each appropriation bill when reported from the committees shall in the concluding clause state the sum total of all the items contained in said bill.

The following additional rules shall be a part of the rules of this House, namely:

167. All private bills hereafter introduced which have been printed by order of either House of the preceding Congress shall not be again printed at the expense of the Government until after a reference to a committee and report thereon with a favorable recommendation.

168. All private bills granting pensions shall hereafter be presented with an accompanying petition of the claimant, and both petition and bill shall be deposited in the petition-box and referred to the appropriate committee without printing, which committee shall consider all such petitions and bills, and shall report from time to time a general bill which shall include therein the names of all persons whom said committee shall find to be entitled to pensions, and accompany each bill with a report upon each case included therein, briefly stating the facts thereof; which general bill and accompanying report shall, when reported to the House, be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I offer as a substitute for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois what I now send to the desk.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. All those propositions must go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; no Committee on Rules has been appointed.

The Clerk read Mr. BLACKBURN's substitute, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed by the Speaker to revise and simplify the rules of the House; that they have leave to sit in vacation, and shall report on or before the first day of the regular session in December next.

Resolved, That until such report is made and adopted the rules of the Forty-fifth Congress be, and are hereby, adopted for the Forty-sixth Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. I offer an amendment to the last resolution of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read Mr. GARFIELD's amendment, as follows:

Add to the second resolution of the substitute these words:

Except the last paragraph of Rule 120, which shall be so amended as to read as follows:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order.

Mr. HOOKER. I offer as a substitute for the pending proposition what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the committee to revise and reform the rules of this House be, and they are hereby, instructed to report at an early day an amendment of the rules of the House, so as to provide—

First. That the Committee on Military Affairs shall receive the estimates and report the bills for the annual support of the Army of the United States, and receive the estimates and report the bill for the annual support of the Military Academy at West Point.

Second. That the Committee on Naval Affairs shall receive the estimates and report the appropriation bills for the annual support of the Navy of the United States.

Third. That the Committee on Foreign Affairs shall receive the estimates and report the appropriation bill for the maintenance and support of the diplomatic and consular system of the United States.

Fourth. That the Committee on Indian Affairs shall receive the estimates and report the appropriation bill for carrying out the treaties and obligations of the Government of the United States with the various Indian tribes.

Fifth. That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads shall receive the estimates and make the appropriation for support of the Post-Office Department of the Government.

Sixth. That the Committee on Commerce shall receive the estimates of the Engineer department and introduce the annual appropriation bill for improvement of rivers and harbors.

Seventh. That the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall report the appropriation bill for the payment of pensions.

Eighth. That the Committee on Appropriations shall receive the estimates and report the appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government and the sundry civil service bill and all deficiency bills.

Ninth. That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be authorized to report all appropriation bills for such public buildings as the needs of the Government may require.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois demand the previous question?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; I yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky, and I also yield to the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Mississippi to have their resolutions printed. I desire that the resolution I have offered and the several amendments may be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let them all be printed and go over till to-morrow.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] to include in the sixth clause of his substitute, relating to estimates for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the estimates also for the construction and repair of light-houses. That belongs properly to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SPRINGER. That can be moved as an amendment to-morrow.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to accept that so that it may be printed with his resolution.

Mr. HOOKER. I have no objection to that being added to the resolution.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that he also make this addition:

That the Committee for the District of Columbia receive the estimates and report the appropriations for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOOKER. I will accept that.

Mr. AIKEN. I desire to offer as a further amendment the following:

That the Committee on Agriculture shall receive the estimates and make the appropriations for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. COX. Is it understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is to be voted on to-morrow? Are all these resolutions to be then voted on?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to answer when they will be voted on.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will call up the subject to-morrow.

Mr. COX. Are they all pending?

The SPEAKER. They will all be printed.

Mr. COX. I wish to save all points of order, because the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] strikes at the most vital rule we have in the interest of economy.

Mr. CONGER. I understand the gentleman from Mississippi accepts the amendment I suggested, to include the estimates for the construction and repair of light-houses?

Mr. HOOKER. I do.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House shall now proceed to place in a box the name of each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives, written upon a separate slip of paper; that he proceed in the presence of the House to draw from said box, one at a time, the said slips of paper, and as each is drawn he shall announce the name of each Member or Delegate, upon which he shall choose his seat for the present Congress: Provided, That before such drawing shall commence the Speaker shall cause each seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order, and that every seat after having been selected shall be deemed forfeited if left unoccupied before the call of the roll of the House: Provided, That Hon. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, of Georgia; Hon. WILLIAM D. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, the oldest member in continuous service, and Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, of New York, the oldest member in point of service, in this House, be allowed to select their seats before the drawing of seats begins.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee to include in his resolution the name of my colleague, Mr. LAY, as one of the gentlemen who shall select his seat. It is well known to the House that during last fall my colleague was very severely stricken with paralysis, and although he is in a manner recovered, is still disabled. He is here, and I ask from the House as a favor to the Missouri delegation that he be allowed to choose his seat before the names of other members are drawn.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will accept that as an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to make the same request for Major HAWK, who has but one leg.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] will now be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Resolved, That the members of the present Congress to whom seats were assigned by consent of the House in the last Congress be allowed to select their seats before the drawing begins.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to offer an amendment so as to place upon the list of those who will draw their seats in advance the name of my venerable friend from New York, Hon. SAMUEL S. COX. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRIGHT. I will accept that amendment, but I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the original resolution covered the exception which he suggests.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to say, in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, that the resolution does not cover all the cases of those to whom this privilege was extended in the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state whom he has omitted who was entitled to this privilege in the last Congress?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I allude to my friend from New York, Mr. COX. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It is now in the resolution as amended.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I move to amend the resolution so as to enable all the members to select their seats. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. I desire to request of the House that the gentleman from New York, Mr. CHITTENDEN, who is deaf, and would be unable to hear anything in the back part of the Hall, be permitted to take the front seat which he occupied during the last Congress. It is not a desirable seat for anybody else. I ask that he be permitted to select his seat before the drawing commences.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is not this proceeding against all the rules of the House?

Mr. MILLS. There are no rules of the House yet.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no rule which would forbid this proceeding.

Mr. BRIGHT. I call for the previous question on my resolution.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to move to insert the name of JAMES A. GARFIELD as among those who may select their seats.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will accept that amendment; and I now insist on the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman will not call the previous question. There are a good many gentlemen on this side of the House who wish to select places for their friends. [Laughter.] I desire to say that we are extending this courtesy much beyond the limit to which it has been extended for years past; and it is very unsatisfactory to the members of the House, especially if they happen to be forced by this change of the rules to take extreme back seats.

Mr. BRIGHT. I insist upon the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. Then I ask that the resolution, as modified, be read, so that gentlemen may know its exact meaning.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Before the previous question is ordered, I move to insert the name of my colleague, [Mr. OSCAR TURNER.] He is lame, and is as much deserving of this distinction as any gentleman upon this floor.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope my colleague will include all the members of the House who have lost one leg or one arm.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ATKINS. Put in all the one-legged men and one-armed men.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the name of my colleague [Mr. SINGLETON] be included among those who may select their seats in advance of the drawing.

Mr. BRIGHT. I insist on the previous question, and I hope the resolution will be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House shall now proceed to place in a box the name of each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives, written upon a separate slip of paper; that he proceed in the presence of the House to draw from said box, one at a time, the said slips of paper; and as each is drawn he shall announce the name of each Member or Delegate upon it, who shall choose his seat for the present Congress: Provided, That before said drawing shall commence the Speaker shall cause each seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order; and that every seat, after having been selected, shall be deemed forfeited if left unoccupied before the call of the roll of the House: Provided, That Hon. ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS, of Georgia; Hon. WILLIAM D. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, the oldest member in continuous service; Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, of New York, the oldest member in point of service in this House; Hon. A. M. LAY of Missouri, Hon. S. S. COX of New York, Hon. S. B. CHITTENDEN of New York, and Hon. JAMES A. GARFIELD of Ohio, be allowed to select seats before the drawing of the seats begins.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] to accept the proposition of my colleague [Mr. MCKENZIE] to include the name of Hon. OSCAR TURNER, of Kentucky.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the name of Mr. HAWK, of Illinois, to be inserted.

Mr. BLOUNT. And I ask that the name of my colleague, Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, be inserted.

Mr. BRIGHT. If that will end the matter I will accept the amendments suggested.

Mr. CHALMERS. Is it in order to move to lay this resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CHALMERS. Then I make that motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will not the object of the gentleman be obtained by calling for a division of the question, and having a separate vote on the part of the resolution excepting certain members?

Mr. CHALMERS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is upon the motion to lay on the table the resolution as modified.

The motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Mr. MCMAHON. I rise to a privileged question, a question that concerns the right of two members of this House to seats here. It concerns the right of two colleagues of mine from the State of Ohio to seats in this House.

I hold in my hand a memorial signed by twenty-three leading prominent citizens of the city of Cincinnati, giving certain reasons why the seats now occupied by those gentlemen should not be occupied by them. I present this as a matter of duty, being the Representative from the State of Ohio whose district immediately adjoins theirs. I now present the memorial to the House, and ask that it be read. After it shall have been read I desire to offer a resolution to refer it to the Committee of Elections, when appointed.

Mr. KEIFER. I rise to a point of order. There is no contest in this case, and the putting in the RECORD the petition of twenty-three citizens of Cincinnati—"prominent citizens," as the gentleman says—out of a population of three hundred thousand, is simply to put in the RECORD something which I think will be neither of benefit to the Congress of the United States nor in order. I suggest also that no one who is interested in this question has ever taken any steps in it. I make the point that this paper ought not to be read and put into the RECORD merely at the instance of twenty-three men out of all the population of that great city.

Mr. MCMAHON. A word upon the point of order. A contest usually is known to the House as a proceeding between two gentlemen who are contending for a seat here. But there is a contest higher than that, and one that is of a higher privilege, if I may draw the distinction in matters of this character. That is when the electors who have no interest in the profits of the office file in the House specifications against the right of certain gentlemen to hold seats here and ask that the matter may be investigated by the proper committee.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MCMAHON. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. Do these citizens proceed under the statute provided in such cases?

Mr. MCMAHON. No; they proceed under the Constitution.

Mr. CALKINS. Another question.

Mr. MCMAHON. Very well.

Mr. CALKINS. Is not this, then, in the nature of a petition, which must go, as other petitions, into the petition-box at the Clerk's desk?

Mr. MCMAHON. No, sir.

Mr. CALKINS. What is the difference?

Mr. MCMAHON. It is in the nature of a contest by electors.

Mr. CALKINS. There is no such thing under the law.

Mr. McMAHON. There is. Why, my dear sir, the Constitution says——[Laughter]

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman ought to address the Chair.

Mr. McMAHON. The Chair knows it already, but the gentleman does not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to decide a point of order upon the paper before it has been read.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the gentleman to state that he was presenting a petition from twenty-three citizens of Cincinnati—"prominent citizens," as he calls them—a petition affecting the seats of two members of this House now sworn in. If I do not state it correctly he will correct me.

Mr. McMAHON. The gentleman has stated it correctly.

Mr. KEIFER. Now, I say that under the statute there could be no contest, and we could not take cognizance in any way of this petition so far as it asks action at our hands. If it is a mere petition, which the Constitution gives to every citizen of the United States the right to present, then it ought to go to the petition-box; or the gentleman presenting it, if he desires it to be read and printed in the RECORD, should ask unanimous consent for that purpose. His object now, I suppose—I may be mistaken—is to have this paper read before the Congress of the United States and published in the RECORD to-morrow morning, and beyond that nothing; for nothing can come of it beyond the mere publication to the country.

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. CARLISLE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that it is incompetent for this House, under that provision of the Constitution which authorizes it to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, to take cognizance of this matter unless there are regular contests by some other persons claiming the seats?

Mr. KEIFER. I have said nothing of the kind. I am very much pleased to answer the question and to say that under the Constitution of the United States Congress has seen fit to provide by law a method of attacking the right of any person claiming a seat in this House, and under that legislation we have been professing to proceed for a great many years, if not throughout the entire history of the Government. Now it is proposed, I suppose, if the gentleman means anything by his question, to override the law and adopt a new method without first providing a new law.

Mr. CARLISLE. I mean to say just this: that under the Constitution of the United States this House has the absolute and uncontrollable power at any time and under any circumstances to inquire into and to determine the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members; and that the act of Congress to which the gentleman from Ohio alludes is a mere practice act, if I may use the expression, which prescribes the method of proceeding in certain cases, that is, in cases where there are regular contests in respect to a seat on this floor; but that legislation does not, and in the nature of things could not, affect the constitutional power which belongs to this House, and which belongs inherently to every legislative body, to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

Mr. McMAHON. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. McMAHON. No, sir; I have yielded enough.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to answer the suggestion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE.]

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to make the point which I rose to make, and which I have not had the opportunity to make.

The Constitution, which we all know is higher than any law of Congress, declares that—

> Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

As the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] has well said, no statute that may be passed can repeal, alter, or modify this constitutional provision; and whatever law on this subject may have been heretofore enacted is a mere "practice act," as the gentleman from Kentucky says, and even as a practice act is not binding upon the House, for the very theory of an act of Congress undertaking to regulate contested elections is wrong, as it implies the participation of the Senate and the President in the regulation of a subject that is by the Constitution committed exclusively to the power of the House alone. That is too plain a proposition to need argument in the mind of any lawyer.

Now let me state the point I was about to make awhile ago. If the gentlemen who failed to receive the certificates of election in this case chose to make a contest, the Committee of Elections and the House of Representatives would require the showing of some reasons why those gentlemen had not pursued the ordinary course, the practice pointed out in the statute, not because the statute is the absolute binding law, but because it represents a sort of agreed practice. But the House of Representatives, if it should discover that a good case existed outside of the statute, might, without asking the concurrence of the Senate or the approval of the President, take just such action as it pleased. There is no question about that matter. It could, for example, upon the convening of the second session of a Congress, allow a contest to be begun. It could on the very last day of the Congress determine that a certain gentleman was not entitled to a seat, although nobody had ever appeared here contesting his election.

In this case we have a petition from twenty-three citizens of Cincinnati; and my colleague [Mr. KEIFER] seems to make much of the fact that there are three hundred thousand citizens there, which I take pride in knowing is true, but I say to him that the statement of one respectable man, when supported by affidavits and charges such as are filed in this case, is enough to put this august body upon inquiry as to whether there was a free and fair election in the city of Cincinnati at the time these two gentlemen who now hold seats claim to have been elected. I bring that petition before the House of Representatives and ask to have it read. When it has been read I shall ask to have it referred to the Committee of Elections for investigation. I shall make this request in the interest of fair elections against repeaters, against corruption. [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" on the republican side.] Yes, we have had a more recent repeater than Hon. Eph Holland, of whom we heard so much in the last Congress. We propose to have in this Congress the proof for whatever we may affirm on this question, and not do as my honorable colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] did in the last Congress when he drew upon his imagination for his facts.

Now I ask, Mr. Speaker, that this be read, and after it is read I will say to gentlemen on the other side that before demanding the previous question I will probably give them an opportunity, if they desire to be heard on it.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say a word or two. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. McMAHON,] my colleague, both seem to understand the Constitution of the United States very well; but they seem to think, for the first time at least expressed upon this floor, that the Constitution executes itself, and that a law which has been passed to carry out that provision of the Constitution is utterly nugatory. I know the Constitution provides that this House shall be the judge of the qualification and election of its members. Suppose, if they carry that out, they should say this House has power to vote out any member sworn in and to vote in any person they find anywhere outside as a mere matter of power. But the law undertakes to direct here what we shall do and how we shall proceed; and it is a matter of procedure or practice, if gentlemen choose to call it so—it is a matter of procedure. We find here a petition offered, for the sole purpose of getting it into the RECORD, so far as we are able to learn from the gentleman presenting it. Do these twenty-three persons intend to prosecute the inquiry? Have they any standing upon which to do it either under the law or Constitution?

Mr. GOODE. Allow me one moment. I wish to remind the gentleman——

Mr. KEIFER. In a moment I will. I wish to state that this attack is the only step which it is professed these men can take, and therefore they have no standing here except as mere petitioners, such as they may have under the Constitution, but not for the purpose of putting into the RECORD a long charge against a member; and I trust the Speaker will make himself quite familiar with this petition before passing upon it. He will find they are attacking members of this House who have already been sworn in, who have rights, and it is proper we should know how they are doing it.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. The point I wish to make is this: the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] has offered this memorial to the House of Representatives accompanied with certain other papers, and I want the paper read before we hear any further discussion.

Mr. McMAHON. And so do I.

Mr. KEIFER. I make the point that it is not proper to present such a paper.

Mr. HOOKER. I understood the gentleman to be discussing the question.

Mr. McMAHON. Let the paper be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers in his place a memorial and states that it embraces a question of privilege. The Chair is unable to decide whether it does or not until it is read.

Mr. KEIFER. You heard the statement of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to make this point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to be heard before the Speaker decides the question. We had a few moments ago the Florida case before the House, brought up by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] and the proposition finally was made that the papers in the case should be printed in the RECORD. Objection was made, but it was afterward withdrawn. However, objection was made to anything like testimony being printed; that only the resolution, the credentials, the exact official papers upon which we were to act, should be printed. Now, my colleague from Ohio has offered no resolution for the action of this House.

Mr. McMAHON. I said that when the paper was read I had a resolution to offer.

Mr. GARFIELD. When it is read! That is put in to be voted on, of course; but now the only, the naked proposition is that a petition of some citizens shall now be offered to be read. It is alleged that it contains affidavits relating to an election about which there is no contest. The formal question the Speaker has to decide is, can any man rise up here on this floor now and demand to have read and spread upon our records any petition he pleases? That is the proposition.

A MEMBER. Why not?

Mr. GARFIELD. Is that a privileged question? Here I hold in my hand a printed document of some thirty pages denying the right of a certain gentleman who a few moments ago was sworn in and who has voted—denying his right to be sworn in. I do not know that I have a right now to stand up in my place and offer this and have it printed to defame a man who is a stranger to me, of whom I know nothing. I should hold myself culpable, and violating the ordinary rules of parliamentary bodies, if I now demanded as a right that this paper which I hold in my hand should be spread upon the records.

But now my colleague from Ohio asks that that same thing be done about two of his brethren on this floor, and, as he says, at the behest of twenty-three citizens. Why, sir, does the gentleman from Ohio not know we can get twenty-three citizens from any corner of this country, if we hunt a little while for them, who can defame any man who holds a seat here, and that we can spend all of this summer in rising to questions of privilege and having printed defamations of the individual characters of the gentlemen who are seated here? If the Speaker now decides that it is a question of privilege to have printed out of hand whatever any member offers in the form of a petition because it is supposed to bear upon the elections by which we came here, I say there is no end to it, and we can keep it going the whole summer and make ourselves the dischargers of the contents of a whole squadron of mud-carts, to be thrown at each other from this time to the end of the session.

Mr. HOOKER. I insist on my point of order, that this being a question of privilege raised by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCMAHON,] it is impossible for the Chair to pass upon the question whether it is a question of privilege or not until he hears the paper read.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. MCMAHON. At present I yield to no one.

Mr. REAGAN. What I wish to say relates to the point of order.

Mr. MCMAHON. I desire first to ask the gentleman from Ohio, who has just taken his seat, what course he would pursue in case a gentleman who had been a candidate for Congress and ought to have contested—that is not this case of course, but it is a supposable case—had been hired by his adversary not to prosecute the contest, and certain of the electors desired to contest the seat and to bring the matter before Congress? and I will go further, what would he do if the facts upon which the contest was based came to the knowledge of the parties after the time fixed for a contest under the statute and when the parties would have to come to the House for authority to enter upon it?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will say this in answer to my colleague: it was found once in Rome that there was no law against parricide because they thought it impossible that any man would kill his father. But when they found that there were men capable of wickedness so great as that, they made a law. Now, if my colleague thinks we have reached the time when such things as he now describes need to be punished or provided for by law, let him bring in a bill and we will pass it and make it lawful to do what he is trying to do without law.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me to say a word on the point of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. MCMAHON. At present I yield to no one. I desire to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] he has got the question in this position: he admits there would be no law for it except the mode I take. Now I want to know whether I violate the privileges of this House, or rather the courtesy due by one colleague to another, when twenty-three citizens and electors in congressional districts sent to me and put in my hands a paper to lay before Congress if I comply with their request. I hold that so important a question as this is higher than all the duties of courtesy to anybody, and when I am requested to present these things to this House I do it and have none of the squeamishness which seems to characterize my colleague from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman has the privilege of the petition-box under the Constitution and a reference to any committee he pleases of any and every memorial. That is what I think I ought to do with the paper which I hold, and which my colleague ought to do with his paper.

Mr. REAGAN. The right of petition is guaranteed by the Constitution. A man who was once President of the United States presented a petition to dissolve the Union, and in the presentation of that petition he was sustained by his associates and the judgment of the country. There can be no doubt as to the right of petition. It stands above the rules of the House and all laws and rests upon the Constitution itself.

The statement is made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] who presents the petition that it relates to the privileges of members of this House. If it does so relate to the privileges of members of this House it becomes not only a petition that would go to the box, but a petition to be presented to the House; and on account of the fact that it raises this question, which is the highest of all questions of privilege, the gentleman is entitled to have it not only presented, but read to the House for its consideration. It seems to me we may discard all reference to rules of procedure in cases of petition and look alone to the highest authority under the Constitution to present a petition for any purpose whatever.

We are not to deny an American citizen the right to petition, and when the gentleman from Ohio presenting the petition states that it raises a question of privilege relating to the seat of a member upon this floor, it does not go into the petition-box but on the Speaker's table, to be presented to the House for its consideration. What action shall be taken afterward is a different question.

The gentleman from Ohio has pursued the proper course in presenting it to the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman will modify his motion so that the petition may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. In the Forty-second Congress, when the name of Alfred M. Waddell was called and he presented himself to be sworn in, a member of this House, without petition from any citizen, rose, and under his rights, not under the rules of this House, but under the Constitution, rose in his seat, [reading:]

Mr. MAYNARD said: Upon my authority as a member of this House, I charge that Alfred M. Waddell, claiming a seat as Representative from the third district of North Carolina, is personally disqualified under the third section of the fourteenth article of the amendments of the Constitution to hold a seat in this House; and I object to his being sworn in.

The SPEAKER. Following the course adopted in the organization of past Houses, the Chair will first swear in those members against whom no objection whatever is presented.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to know if the Committee of Elections did not report unanimously in a case from Mississippi that the contestant should not prosecute his suit at all because of a mere informality in serving the notice of the contest?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That is not pertinent to this case.

Mr. MCMAHON. If the gentlemen upon the other side will agree that this memorial will be printed in the RECORD and that the matter shall lie over until to-morrow, I am willing to agree to that.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not understand how my colleague from Ohio can hold the floor upon my point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] will allow me to answer his colleague's question. What was it?

Mr. KEIFER. I put this question: Whether Mr. Lynch, of Mississippi, did not come here and contest the seat of one of the members from Mississippi, and if his committee were not unanimous in reporting to the House that the contest could not be carried on, because the notice was sent by mail, when it should have been sent in some other way, and whether the petition of that man, a citizen of the United States, was not disregarded?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to answer that question in justice to the Committee of Elections of the last Congress.

Mr. MCMAHON. I do not want to have the paper read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio states that it is a question of privilege; but the Chair is utterly unable to decide whether it is a question of privilege or not until he knows what is contained in the papers.

Mr. CONGER. Then I submit that, instead of placing that large mass of evidence or affidavits on our record, it is the duty of the Speaker, in such way as he thinks best, himself to examine the papers, and if they involve a question of high privilege to rule upon that. I object to the RECORD being cumbered with the papers.

Mr. MCMAHON. How could the House determine upon the correctness of the decision of the Speaker if it had not heard the papers read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will himself read the rule:

Whenever the Speaker is of the opinion that a question of privilege is involved in a proposition he must entertain it in preference to any other business.—Journal, 1, 29, page 724. [Such opinion, of course, being subject to an appeal.] And when a proposition is submitted which relates to the privileges of the House, it is his duty to entertain it, at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege.

The Chair, of course, would have to present the question to the House.

Mr. CONGER. That is the very point that I make.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe the Chair decided two years ago that the former rules of the House were not binding on the then House until adopted by the House.

The SPEAKER. We are certainly proceeding under some rules, and the Chair thinks that is the common parliamentary practice.

Mr. MCMAHON. I will make a proposition to gentlemen on the other side: that this paper be printed and laid over until to-morrow, and then I will call up all the questions in it in connection with a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would himself like to have an opportunity to examine into the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it go over until to-morrow without printing.

Mr. MCMAHON. I do not agree to that.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] has already stated enough to enable us to determine the character of the paper. He says it contains statements affecting the rights of members upon this floor; the gentleman has already stated that. Now, I do not want to consent that this paper shall be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio on the left [Mr. KEI-

FER] will observe that the Constitution contains these words: "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members."

Mr. KEIFER. I understand that, and I tried to state it myself once before to-day. I understand the gentleman on the other side to state that his petition contains charges against members upon this floor who have already been sworn in. He stated enough of it to indicate that he merely wants to put the paper into the RECORD for the purpose of having it go to the country. He has not stated that it is proposed to proceed under the law and have a contest. It therefore cannot be a question of privilege affecting the seat of any member.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be clearly unwilling, as going beyond the range of his duties, to decide that a paper touching the right of a member to a seat on this floor does not contain a question of privilege, without opportunity to examine it.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Ohio has himself said that it does not contain anything——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not decide upon an allegation.

Mr. MCMAHON. There is a great deal more to be added to what I have said.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to decide a question of this character upon the facts contained in the petition.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair and of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] to section 350 of McCrary on Elections, which it seems to me settles this point. I ask the Clerk to read the section which I have marked.

Mr. KEIFER. This petition affects a member upon this floor, and ought to be regarded as a sacred matter.

The SPEAKER. The rule so regards it, and therefore makes it a matter of high privilege.

Mr. KEIFER. Therefore it should not be put in the RECORD when the gentleman who offers the paper, memorial, or whatever he chooses to call it, does not undertake to state to the Chair or to the House that it is proposed to follow up the petition for any purpose in the world.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to say that he proposed to offer a resolution.

Mr. KEIFER. He has said that this petition is not a proceeding under the law for contesting the right to a seat in the manner provided by law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not decide the effect of laws.

Mr. KEIFER. I suggest that the whole subject, without printing, go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the paragraph from McCrary on Elections, which I have sent to the Clerk's desk, be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House of Representatives of the United States may, in its discretion, proceed to inquire into the validity of the election of one of its members, without any formal contest having been instituted. A contestant is not absolutely necessary. (Reeder vs. Whitfield, 1 Bart, 189.)

The SPEAKER. The people of a district can always petition upon the subject; that has always been held.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the point involved here.

Mr. MCMAHON. I call for the reading of the paper.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the paper be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed.

Mr. MCMAHON. How can the House refer it without knowing what it is?

Mr. KEIFER. Just as well as any other petition.

Mr. COX. I suggest to gentlemen on both sides that this paper be printed, and that we now adjourn, on the suggestion of the Speaker that a question is pending that he wishes to examine before to-morrow.

Mr. CONGER. I will modify my motion so that it be printed and referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed.

Mr. MCMAHON. I do not yield for that motion

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] makes the suggestion that this paper be printed. Does he mean in the RECORD or in the usual form?

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, so that we may know to-morrow what it is.

Mr. KEIFER. That is what we object to. Let it be printed in the usual form, and not in the RECORD.

Mr. COX. Let it be printed in the RECORD, of course.

Mr. KEIFER. It can be printed without being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COX. Then how would we know what it is?

Mr. KEIFER. It might be printed as we print our bills and reports.

Mr. COX. And you might get it in two weeks from now.

Mr. MCMAHON. If gentlemen will not agree to the proposition made on this side, I must have the paper read.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand that the whole object of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from New York in having the paper printed in the RECORD is to give it publicity.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio raises a question of order; and the Chair decides that he is not bound to decide, and cannot intelligently decide, a question of order until he hears read the paper on which it is raised.

Mr. KEIFER. The Chair can read the paper without its being printed.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair should read it without its being read to the House, how could the House intelligently act upon the question if an appeal should be taken?

Mr. WILBER. Let it lie over until to-morrow, and let the Chair in the mean time read it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I move that the memorial be laid on the table.

Mr. MCMAHON. I do not yield for that motion.

Mr. KEIFER. Can the gentleman hold the floor all the time the paper is being read?

Mr. MCMAHON. I have not yielded the floor. Gentlemen have been discussing the question of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Upon a motion to lay the paper on the table, have we not the right to hear it read before we vote on the question?

The SPEAKER. No member can intelligently vote upon a proposition to lay a paper on the table until the paper has been read. Otherwise members would be proceeding entirely in the dark.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. Is a motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I make that motion.

Mr. MCMAHON. If the House should adjourn, this would be the pending business to-morrow morning I presume. I cannot yield the floor except with that understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is bound to recognize the motion to adjourn. The House if it chooses can vote the motion down.

Mr. MCMAHON. If this question comes up to-morrow morning as the unfinished business I do not object.

DAILY HOUR OF MEETING.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to suggest that some gentleman offer a resolution fixing the hour of daily meeting.

Mr. COX. I move that the hour for the daily meetings of the House be twelve o'clock m. until otherwise ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

DRAWING FOR SEATS.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask that by unanimous consent we now proceed to draw seats. The gentleman who has made the motion to adjourn is willing to withdraw it for this purpose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] allows his matter to go over.

Mr. MCMAHON. If it does not lose its place.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that it is a question of privilege; and, if so, it cannot lose its position.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BRIGHT. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk, and upon its adoption I move the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House shall at once proceed to place in a box the name of each Member and Delegate of the House of Representatives, written or printed upon a separate slip of paper; that he proceed in the presence of the House to draw from said box, one at a time, the said slips of paper, and as each is drawn he shall pronounce the name of each Member or Delegate upon it, who shall choose his seat for the present Congress: Provided, That before said drawing shall commence the Speaker shall cause each seat to be vacated, and shall see that every seat continues vacant until it is selected under this order, and that every seat after having been selected under this order shall be deemed forfeited if left unoccupied before the call of the roll of the House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask consent that when the name of my colleague, Mr. LAY, shall be called I may be allowed to select his seat for him. He is now absent on account of sickness. [Cries of "All right!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and leave is granted.

Mr. DAVIDSON. There is now on the roll no name from the second district of Florida. I ask that a slip with the words "second district of Florida" be put into the box, and that when this slip is drawn the Clerk be authorized to select a seat to be occupied by the Representative from that district.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask that when the name of my colleague, Mr. JAMES, who is necessarily absent, is drawn, a seat be selected for him by the Clerk.

Objection was made.

In pursuance of the resolution of the House, the drawing for seats was then proceeded with, beginning at three o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m., the name of Mr. WILLIS being the first drawn and that of Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, the last.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 19, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

HANNIBAL HAMLIN, a Senator from the State of Maine, and SAMUEL B. MAXEY, a Senator from the State of Texas, appeared in their seats to-day.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I present the credentials of my colleague, [Mr. JOHN B. GORDON,] chosen by the Legislature of Georgia a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1879. I ask that they be read and filed. I desire also to state that my colleague is detained from the Senate by sickness.

The credentials were read and ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared below the bar of the Senate, and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the House of Representatives to inform the Senate that a quorum of the House has assembled, and that SAMUEL J. RANDALL, one of the Representatives from the State of Pennsylvania, has been chosen Speaker, and GEORGE M. ADAMS, of Kentucky, Clerk; and that the House is now ready to proceed to business.

I am further directed to inform the Senate that the House has appointed JOSEPH C. S. BLACKBURN of Kentucky, JAMES A. GARFIELD of Ohio, and JOHN GOODE of Virginia, a committee on the part of the House, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses has assembled, and that Congress is ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make.

COMMITTEES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of the committees of the body.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To which the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask that unanimous consent be given to the suspending of the forty-sixth rule so far as it requires the appointment of the standing and other committees of the Senate to be by ballot.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALLACE. I also ask unanimous consent to amend Rule 47 by adding at the end of said rule these words:

A Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, to consist of seven Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be observed.

Mr. HOAR. The suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania will obviate the necessity of reading the list of the committees to which I referred.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the standing committees of the present session be according to the list presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania and reported by the Secretary?

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask unanimous consent to the creation of the following select committees, and move that each of said committees thus created shall be vested with all the powers and authorities heretofore given to each of the select committees on the respective subjects to which they relate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The list of select committees presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be reported.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask to be excused from service upon the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi asks to be excused from service on these two committees. Is there objection? The Chairs hears none, and the Senator is excused.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WINDOM. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That the opponents to the extension of the patent of E. N. Horsford have leave to withdraw their papers from the files of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be made, subject to the condition imposed by the rule.

Mr. WINDOM. I want to say that I think the rule does not apply to anything but claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the condition will not apply.

Mr. WINDOM. I was afraid the remark of the President might lead the Clerk to think that he so construed it.

Mr. HOAR. Should not copies be filed?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair always imposes that condition. The rule so provides.

Mr. WINDOM. Does the Chair hold that the rule requires that copies should be left in any other cases than claims?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Where there has been an adverse report.

Mr. WINDOM. There is no adverse report in this case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be none, then of course the rule does not apply.

Mr. HOAR. I made the report in this case. It is a case of application for the extension of a patent in which, after a very earnest controversy and a hearing in the nature of a judicial hearing before the committee, there was a report in favor of the petition by a divided committee. Therefore it is a case where, if the application be renewed hereafter before the Senate, it is important to the interests of both sides that all the evidence should be preserved on the files of the Senate; and I think, therefore, there will be no difficulty in filing copies.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the resolution lie on the table until to-morrow for the reason that the evidence is very voluminous. I think it is contained in large books, which, I understand, are not in print, and it will be almost impossible to leave copies.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Minnesota will examine into the character of the matter I will accede to anything he shall deem proper under the circumstances.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the resolution lie over until to-morrow that it may examined.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will lie over until to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. KIRKWOOD, it was Ordered, That John S. Logan have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers filed by him in support of a claim by him heretofore presented, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Whereas the necessity for the present special session of Congress has been occasioned by the failure of the last Congress to make appropriations for the support of the Army and for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year; and

Whereas the business and other public interests of the country will be best promoted by confining legislation at this session to making provision for the objects aforesaid, and by an early adjournment: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That all bills and joint resolutions, excepting those for the aforesaid purposes, shall be referred to appropriate committees and not reported until the next December session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Let it go over.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

MARSHALS AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. WALLACE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate a detailed statement of the accounts of the marshals of the United States in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, and Maryland rendered to this date, for and in regard to the employment of and payment of wages or fees charged for services performed by them or their special deputies in relation to the conduct of elections in November, 1878, showing the amount claimed by or paid to each of said special deputies and the aggregate paid or claimed from the United States by the said marshals for services connected with the elections.

Mr. CONKLING. That had better lie over. We want to know about some other States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will need a little amendment besides, to get a little further information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order to print will be entered.

TRANSACTIONS OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I submit a resolution, which is the same resolution that I offered at the last session, and to which no response was made.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the amount of commissions or other compensation paid to bankers, brokers, firms, companies, syndicates, and individuals for services in negotiating the sale of bonds and other obligations of the United States, from the year 1862 until the present time; when and to whom such commissions or compensation was paid; and, when paid to syndicates, firms, corporations, or companies, to state the names of the persons composing the same. And also to inform the Senate whether any, and, if any, what amount, of commissions or other compensation has been paid to bankers, brokers, firms, companies, syndicates, and individuals for services rendered in refunding any of the bonds of the United States; and if any such payments have been made to state when and to whom made; and also whether interest has been paid on called bonds at the same time that interest was accruing on the bonds sold to redeem the same, and whether such double interest has been uniformly paid while the refunding operation has been in progress, or on bonds sold for resumption purposes, specifying whether there has been any exception to such payments of double interest, and who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time of such exception, and how much double interest has been paid on each class of bonds and the total amount thereof; and whether the money received for bonds sold by any bank or syndicate has, in all cases, been allowed to remain on deposit with the national banks acting as Government depositories pending this call of bonds, specifying the names of the banks and the length of time during which the proceeds of the bonds sold have been left on deposit with each bank; and whether at any time any gold coin has been delivered by the Treasury to any parties concerned in the negotiation of United States bonds or otherwise in exchange for or upon the security of United States bonds, or in advance of the payment thereof, pending any call of bonds on which interest was allowed or paid up to the date of the maturity of the call; and also whether any money in the Treasury held for the payment of overdue called bonds has been left on deposit without interest in any Government depository, and what was the largest amount thereof at any one time, stating the names of the banks in which such money was deposited, and what security the Treasury held for the payment thereof when demanded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest that it had better go over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to take from the table the credentials of Charles H. Bell, claiming to be a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, and that they be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to report the same back to the Senate at as early a day as practicable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the credentials of Charles H. Bell, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to report at as early a day as practicable.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania and to that side of the Chamber (of course it will be not a matter of controversy unless they assent) whether it would not be as convenient to set this case down for a hearing at some fixed day in the Senate, say next week, instead of referring it to a committee? The question depends upon the construction of a simple clause in the Constitution and on a few precedents which are familiar to most Senators, and can very easily be made familiar to all in the discussion. It would probably save time and labor to take that course.

Mr. WALLACE. The course suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts would be a departure from the usual procedure of such business in this Chamber. The usual course is to proceed by reference to the appropriate committee. Here is a committee constituted for these specific purposes, and I think the credentials should go there, and we should have a report. When the case comes back Senators can be heard and the question can be fairly met.

Mr. ROLLINS. If we can have an early report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I have no doubt that will be the case from the assurances I have received, perhaps it would be best to allow the reference to be made.

Mr. WALLACE. There is no intention save to have a report at the earliest practicable day, and I so worded my motion.

Mr. ROLLINS. With that understanding, I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. GARLAND, (at twelve o'clock and forty-two minutes p. m.) The committee has just retired to wait upon the President, and I move that we take a recess for an hour.

The motion was agreed to; and at the expiration of the recess (at one o'clock and forty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate reassembled.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the committee appointed by the Senate to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that a quorum of the body is ready to receive any communication he may have to make, have performed their duty, and have been informed.

by the President that he will communicate with the Senate immediately in writing.

At one o'clock and forty-seven minutes p. m. the President's Secretary, Mr. W. K. RODGERS, appeared below the bar, and said:

Mr. President, I am directed by the President of the United States to deliver to the Senate a message in writing.

The message was handed to the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary of the Senate (Mr. GEORGE C. GORHAM) read the message, as follows:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

The failure of the last Congress to make the requisite appropriations for legislative and judicial purposes, for the expenses of the several Executive Departments of the Government, and for the support of the Army, has made it necessary to call a special session of the Forty-sixth Congress.

The estimates of the appropriations needed, which were sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the opening of the last session, are renewed, and are herewith transmitted to both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Regretting the existence of the emergency which requires a special session of Congress at a time when it is the general judgment of the country that the public welfare will be best promoted by permanency in our legislation and by peace and rest, I commend these few necessary measures to your considerate attention.

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

WASHINGTON, March 19, 1879.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the message be printed and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 3,000 copies of the President's message be printed for the use of the Senate.

INDEX TO CONGRESSIONAL DEBATES.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to consider and report as to the expediency of providing for a complete index to the congressional debates from the inauguration of the Government to the present time.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at one o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 19, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Hon. A. B. JAMES, member-elect from New York, appeared, and was duly qualified by taking the test oath.

DELEGATE FROM NEW MEXICO.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Speaker, I present the credentials of the Delegate from New Mexico and ask that he be sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the credentials will be waived in the absence of any objection.

There was no objection.

Hon. M. S. OTERO, Delegate from New Mexico, appeared, and was duly qualified by taking the test oath.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire by unanimous consent to offer a resolution which I think is necessary to enable the House to transact the public business in a regular and orderly manner.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the order adopted by the Forty-fifth Congress in relation to the admission of persons to the floor of the Hall during the sessions of the House be, and the same is hereby, continued in force, and the officers of the House are hereby directed to see that the same is strictly enforced.

The resolution was adopted unanimously.

STATIONERY FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. CALKINS. I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized to furnish all necessary stationery to members and officers of the House out of any stationery now on hand, keeping an account thereof, and to be charged to an appropriation hereafter to be made for that purpose.

The resolution was adopted.

SECOND DISTRICT OF FLORIDA.

The SPEAKER. The first question in order this morning is the one concerning the Representative from the second district of Florida, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, by an arrangement between the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and myself he is first to take the floor for half an hour, and then this side will be entitled to a half hour. After that the other side will alternate for another half hour, this side to conclude with half an hour, making in all two hours.

The SPEAKER. The understanding is that one hour be allowed to each side on this subject. The gentleman having charge of the subject will be kind enough to indicate to whom he first yields.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will yield for half an hour to the gentleman from Maine, and after he has concluded I will further advise the Chair.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, this case, which it becomes my duty to present to the House, is somewhat out of the usual order, and I am encouraged from the fact that it is unusual to address myself to the conscience and judgment of members. I do not hold as some republicans do, that the democratic party is all——

Mr. COX. All right. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE, (after a pause.) No, all depraved. I do not think as some gentlemen do that you cannot get a verdict just and right from the democratic side of this House. I do believe when they are called upon to act judicially we have a right to expect that they will do so, and therefore I address myself confidently to the democratic side of this House in the case under consideration.

I am aware in the discussion of election cases and in their decision we are very apt to ask a question that an old member of the House once asked: "Which is our scoundrel?" [Laughter.] And the reason of that is this: a mass of testimony is taken, many questions of law are submitted, a thousand pages of testimony go to the Election Committee, is submitted to them, and their investigation occupies weeks of time. Now when that Election Committee divides, the democratic members reporting in favor of their member and the republican members reporting in favor of theirs, there is but one way on earth for the members of this House to do, and that is for the democrats having confidence in their side to vote for their side and the republicans having confidence in theirs to vote for theirs. For, sir, no man has time to examine an election case for himself. So I say it does not indicate want of fairness or want of judgment in supporting the one side or the other side as the Election Committee may report. No other course is left open to us. We must accept the verdict of those who have made the examination and upon whose judgment we rely.

But, sir, here is a case which addresses itself to this House as a committee. It is in a nutshell; no man can fail to understand it if he listen to an hour's discussion; no man can fail to see all its bearings; no man can fail to understand every question of law which is presented; no man can fail to understand all the facts which it becomes necessary to lay before him.

Therefore in this case every member of this House is called upon for himself to pass judgment upon the case as it is presented on the facts and the law. Therefore, sir, I ask this House to consider the facts, consider the law, and then pass their judgment judicially, as they ought.

Now, sir, what is the case? The second district of Florida comprises seventeen counties. In fifteen of these counties no question whatever has ever been raised; no charge of fraud, no accusation of unfairness. All parties agree that in fifteen counties in the second district of Florida the election was fair.

In two counties there is alleged trouble, the counties of Brevard and Madison. I will take Brevard first.

In the county of Brevard, which never polled over 169 votes, in the last election the democratic candidate for Congress received 310 votes. There were cast for him at the polls 116 votes, but the canvassing board of the county deliberately, wickedly, and designedly added 194 votes, giving him altogether 310. Now, sir, there is no dispute about that. Everybody admits it, and the men who committed the fraud have been indicted, tried, convicted, and are to-day in the penitentiary for adding 194 votes to the vote of the democratic candidate for Congress. To-day, I say, they are in the penitentiary, paying the penalty for their crime against the purity of elections in Florida.

Mr. Hull, in his answer, admits that the vote of Brevard County was thrown out properly. In his answer he insists that the action of the State canvassing board in rejecting the returns of Madison and Brevard Counties was right.

So Mr. Hull himself admits that these men are in the penitentiary to-day rightfully, and that Brevard County was rejected by the State canvassing board rightfully, and all he claims is that Madison County should have been rejected also.

Now, sir, coming to Madison County. In precinct 4 the inspectors made no return to the county clerk of the vote in that precinct, and that is the only claim of wrong in Madison County—no return made to the clerk in that precinct. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. Hull) received a certain number of votes and Mr. Bisbee a certain other number—Mr. Bisbee 186, Mr. Hull 129—and the State canvassing board threw out Madison County because there was no return made of precinct 4 to the county clerk. Not because there was a fraudulent return, but because there was no return whatever. Gentlemen will please remember this, for it is an important fact, considered in connection with the law.

Brevard and Madison Counties elected Mr. Hull by 12 majority, and if Brevard and Madison were properly thrown out then Hull is entitled to his seat in this House. If, on the contrary, Madison was improperly thrown out, then Bisbee is entitled to his seat. The State canvassing-board returns threw out, as I say, both Madison and Brevard and that elected Hull by a majority of 12, and the governor of Florida accordingly issued his certificate of election to Mr. Hull, under which certificate he claims his seat to-day.

Mr. Bisbee protested to the governor that there had been an illegal act done by the State canvassing board, and that Madison County should be counted and not thrown out, and that he ought not to give the certificate to Hull. He proceeded to ask of the supreme court of Florida a writ of mandamus compelling the State canvassing board of Florida to recanvass the vote of the second district of Florida, and he declares that the casting out of the returns of Madison County was illegal.

The supreme court of Florida examined the question with care, and passed judgment that the act of throwing out the vote in Madison County was illegal on the part of the State canvassing board, and ordered them to make a recanvass and canvass the vote of that county.

The State board of canvassers, in compliance with the order of the supreme court of Florida, proceeded to recanvass the returns, counted the vote of Madison County as it ought to have been counted in the first instance, and then made return that Mr. Bisbee was elected a Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress from the second congressional district of Florida. Under that return, ordered by the supreme court of the State of Florida, Mr. Bisbee is entitled to his seat in this House, and Mr. Hull is not entitled to a seat.

Mr. Bisbee, having received this return, and the certificate having been filed by the State board of canvassers, applied to the governor of Florida for his certificate of election. The governor refused to give it to him, and wrote him a letter which I desire to read:

Under existing circumstances it will be impossible for me to issue to you a certificate of election as member of Congress for the State of Florida in the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States. I have some time since issued and signed a certificate to another person to this position, and have no power to revoke that certificate. If you are entitled to a seat in the Forty-sixth Congress it is for that body to decide.

I submit to this House that the governor of Florida had no right, as the chief executive of that State, to make that reply to Mr. Bisbee. The supreme court of the State had notified the governor that his former certificate was illegal and void, that the former canvass was illegal and void. The supreme court had directed a new canvass, and the State board of canvassers had made that new canvass and had certified their return according to law. It was then the duty of the governor to issue his second certificate on that second return which the supreme court of the State held to be valid and legal.

The governor submitted the question to his democratic attorney-general, and he gave a carefully prepared opinion that it was his duty—remember that, that it was his duty—to issue a new certificate of election to Mr. Bisbee. And still the governor refused to comply.

Again, Mr. Bisbee applied to the supreme court for a writ of mandamus to compel the governor of Florida to issue a certificate to him. I have just received the opinion of the court in that case. The court says that the proposition of the petitioner is that the judicial department of the government may control the executive in reference to an executive duty. The two republican judges hold that they have not power to compel the governor of the State to issue a certificate to Mr. Bisbee. The democratic judge dissents, and says that the issuing of the certificate on the part of the governor is nothing but a ministerial act, and that the court has the power to compel the governor and ought to compel him to issue a certificate to Mr. Bisbee in accordance with the law of Florida. That is the opinion of the court which I have just read.

You have first the opinion of the court that the first count was illegal and void. Then you have a second count ordered by the court under a mandamus. You have then the opinion of the court indirectly declaring that it is the duty of the governor to issue a certificate to Mr. Bisbee, two of the judges holding that they had not the power to compel him to do so, and one, the democratic judge, holding that the court had the power to compel him to do so. In addition to that you have the opinion of the democratic attorney-general of Florida that it was the duty of the governor to issue a certificate to Mr. Bisbee. Understand, the court all agree that it is the duty of the governor to give the certificate to Mr. Bisbee; two of the judges holding that they have no power to compel him to do so, and one judge, the democratic judge, holding that the court has the power to compel the governor to issue that certificate.

Now, as a matter of fact, I wish further to show that the democratic sentiment in Florida concurs with that opinion of the court. The good men of Florida, who believe in purity of elections, concur with the court. I read from the leading democratic paper in the State of Florida, The East Florida Banner:

Now, it is clearly established that Mr. Bisbee received a majority of the votes and was legally elected. We think Mr. Hull should gracefully yield the certificate of election and retire from politics. He owes this much to the people of this district and the party of which he is a member, and the party ought to demand it of him.

That is from a leading democratic paper in the State of Florida. I take it I did not assume too much when I said that the democrats of this House, when they knew the facts in this case, would say the same to Mr. Hull, and that where the court of the State and the canvassing board and the people of Florida admit that Mr. Bisbee is duly elected he should receive his seat, although Mr. Hull had the certificate of election.

Now I wish to show that the return from Brevard County was legally rejected and the return from Madison was legally counted by the court. Here is the law of Florida, giving the secretary of state, the comptroller of public accounts, and the attorney-general authority as a State canvassing board:

If any such returns shall be shown as shall appear to be so irregular and false or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination.

Now, in Brevard County, the return, as everybody admits, was false, was fraudulent, was wicked, so that the vote could not be determined. But in Madison County there was no false return, no fraudulent return. The only claim made was that in one precinct the return was not made to the county clerk. Thus gentlemen of this House will see that the court was entirely right in rejecting Brevard County and in admitting Madison County. It was a strict compliance with the law.

By the way, I will remark that if Madison County had been counted Mr. Bisbee's majority in precinct No. 4 would have been 57 more than it is now.

Now I call attention to a parallel case which arose at the opening of the last Congress from this very State, between Mr. DAVIDSON and Mr. Purman, where there had been two certificates, one by one governor and one by another; one under the first canvass, and the other under a second canvass ordered by the court. I call attention to the remarks of the Clerk of this House upon the case thus presented.

The Clerk read as follows:

From the State of Florida certificates were received, signed by Marcellus L. Stearns as governor of Florida, with the seal of the State attached, certifying that William J. Purman was elected in the first and that Horatio Bisbee was elected in the second district of said State. These certificates bear date respectively December 9 and December 14, 1876, and seem to be regular in form.

But in reference to the first district two certificates were subsequently received, signed by George F. Drew, governor of Florida, with the seal of the State attached, and bearing date respectively January 12 and February 26, 1877. These certificates recite the fact that the canvass of the vote upon which the certificate in favor of Mr. Purman was based had been declared by the supreme court of Florida to be illegal, and that another canvass had been made in obedience to the order of the supreme court of Florida, which canvass resulted in the election of ROBERT H. M DAVIDSON as Representative from said district.

Under such circumstances the Clerk felt bound to place on the roll from the first district of Florida the name of ROBERT H. M. DAVIDSON, whose credentials show that he was elected in accordance with the laws of the State of Florida as interpreted by the supreme court of that State.

Mr. FRYE. Thus gentlemen will see that at the opening of the Forty-fifth Congress the Clerk of this House, without any dissent to the doctrine on the part of the House, held that he was compelled to recognize the authority of the supreme court of the State of Florida and the second canvass made under that authority, and admitted Mr. DAVIDSON to the seat.

Again, I call the attention of this House, and of the democratic side particularly, to the recent report made by the "Potter committee," so called——

Mr. KNOTT. If my friend will allow me one moment, I wish simply to remark that in the Florida case as it arose in the last Congress a certificate, signed by the governor and authenticated by the seal of his State, was granted to the person whose name was put upon the roll. In this case Mr. Hull holds such a certificate, and Mr. Bisbee does not.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that matter perfectly well. There were in the Florida case as it arose in the last Congress two certificates. Mr. Purman had one and Mr. DAVIDSON another. Now, if gentlemen will look at the law of the State of Florida they will find that the certificate of the governor is nothing but a mere ministerial act certifying to what the State canvassing board are required by law to find. Now the Clerk of this House to-day has before him the return of the State canvassing board with their certificate. The governor stands in the position of refusing to certify to the facts which appear in that certificate.

Mr. KNOTT. Nevertheless, the certificate of the governor is the credential prescribed by law.

Mr. FRYE. I hold otherwise. Here is the law of Florida:

Whenever any person shall be elected to the office of elector of President or Vice-President, or Representative in Congress, the governor shall make out and sign, and cause to be sealed with the seal of the State, and transmit to such person, a certificate of his election.

And the democratic judge of Florida holds that this is a mere ministerial act. Now take the law in relation to the canvassing board and see what they are compelled to do:

On the thirty-fifth day after the holding of any general or special election for any State officers, members of the Legislature, or Representatives in Congress, or sooner, if the returns shall have been received from the several counties wherein elections shall have been held, the secretary of state, attorney-general, and the comptroller of public accounts, or any two of them, together with any other member of the cabinet who may be designated by them, shall meet at the office of the secretary of state, pursuant to notice to be given by the secretary of state, and form a board of State canvassers, and proceed to canvass the returns of said election, and determine and declare who shall have been elected to such office, or as such member, as shown by such returns. If any such returns shall be shown as shall appear to be so irregular, false, or fraudulent that the board shall be unable to determine the true vote for any such officer or member, they shall so certify, and shall not include such return in their determination and declaration; and the secretary of state shall preserve and file in his office all such returns together with such other documents and papers as may have been received by him or by said board of canvassers.

The said board shall make and sign a certificate containing, in words written at full length, the whole number of votes given for each officer and for members of the Legislature, and therein declare the result, which certificate shall be recorded in the office of the secretary of state in a book to be kept for that purpose; and the secretary of state shall cause a certified copy of such certificate to be published once in one or more newspapers printed at the seat of government.

Now, the laws of Florida make that return and that certificate of the State canvassing board evidence everywhere—not the certificate of the governor of Florida, which is the result of a mere ministerial act.

Mr. HOUSE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUSE. Does the gentleman deny that under the laws of Florida the certificate given by the governor constitutes the credential of a member of this House?

Mr. FRYE. My position is this: when the supreme court of the State has determined that the certificate already issued by the governor is illegal, void, and ought to be revoked; when the attorney-general of the State has declared to the governor that it is his duty to issue a new certificate; when the Clerk of this House and this House itself have recognized a recanvass in the State of Florida, and held that we must act under the recanvass, and when the Potter committee has held that the governor of Florida himself was elected by a recanvass ordered by the court—under these circumstances, if the governor refuses to revoke his previous certificate and to give a certificate to the gentleman who is declared legally elected, I deny that the old certificate is legally, properly, justly receivable by this House as a certificate of the election of Mr. Hull.

Mr. HOUSE. If the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSE. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSE. There must be something to constitute under the laws of Florida the credentials of a member-elect to this House. I ask the gentleman whether Mr. Hull has not that certificate in due form?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir.

Mr. HOUSE. Has he not the certificate of the governor under the constitution and laws of Florida?

Mr. FRYE. He has not the credentials of a member-elect. He has a certificate which has been declared by the supreme court of Florida to be null and void.

Mr. HOUSE. Is it not formal on its face, and in conformity to the laws of Florida?

Mr. FRYE. But is it not the duty of this House to recognize the supreme court of a State?

Mr. HOUSE. On a prima facie case?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, on a prima facie case. The certificate of the canvassing board by the laws of Florida is made evidence in the House of Representatives as well as anywhere else. I desire to put into this case the return of the canvassing board made at the second canvass, as follows:

From which canvass it appears that the whole number of votes cast for Representative of the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America from the second congressional district of Florida was 21,358, of which Noble A. Hull received 10,578 votes, Horatio Bisbee, jr., received 10,779 votes, and Charles H. Smith received 1 vote. Whereupon it is determined and declared that Horatio Bisbee, jr., is duly elected Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America from the second congressional district of the State of Florida, as shown by the returns.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is the case. I have stated it with perfect fairness. I have tried to state it clearly. It is in a nutshell. There was an election in two counties, one county rejected for fraud and the other county improperly rejected. Mr. Hull was elected by 12 majority.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER. The committee appointed to wait upon the President have returned, and are now ready to report. The gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, the committee appointed to wait upon the President of the United States and to inform him that Congress is now organized and ready to receive any communication he may have to make have discharged that duty, and the President requested the committee to say that he will communicate forthwith to the House through a message in writing.

SECOND DISTRICT OF FLORIDA.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine will resume his remarks.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, I was stating to correct this wrong there was a recanvass ordered by the court which was made in strict compliance with the order of the court and the law. That recanvass and the certificate of the State canvassing board declared Mr. Bisbee to be elected Representative from the second district of Florida. Gentlemen say because the governor refused to listen to his court, because the governor refused to listen to the attorney-general, because the governor does not recognize the right of the court or the attorney-general or the conscience of parties in Florida, that we as a House are compelled to seat Mr. Hull who received his election by fraud in Brevard County and by failure to return in Madison County. I say, gentlemen, we can afford to do right in this matter and you cannot afford to do wrong.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman to submit the opinion of the attorney-general.

Mr. FRYE. I have referred to it as a part of my remarks, but it is already printed in the RECORD of this morning with the papers in the case.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I now yield, Mr. Speaker, for ten minutes, to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBB.]

Mr. COBB. Mr. Speaker, this case comes from the second congressional district in the State of Florida. Mr. Hull and Mr. Bisbee were the opposing candidates for Congress in said district at the election held in November, 1878. Mr. Hull received the certificate of his election from the governor of the State, and has presented it to the Clerk of this House, who has placed his name on the roll, as the law directs he shall do in such case. Objection is now made to his being sworn in. And it is insisted by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that Mr. Bisbee shall be sworn in and take the seat. It is not pretended, however, that Bisbee has a legal certificate of his election. Indeed it is not pretended that he has any certificate. He has none. It would therefore be in violation of law and the well-settled precedents of this House to admit him to his seat. Then, as Bisbee does not, under the rule of law and the well-settled practice of this House, present such evidence as will entitle him to be sworn in I will discuss the right of Mr. Hull to be sworn. The law clearly provides how this House shall determine the question of his right. The House is now trying the prima facie case only. If Mr. Hull makes a prima facie case he must be sworn in. This is all that is required of him until after the House is fully organized. After the House is so organized, then the case may be referred under the practice to the Committee of Elections and the fact ascertained as to who is really elected.

Does Mr. Hull present a prima facie case to the House? It will only be necessary to read the law, which is plain in its provisions, to show that he does. The Revised Statutes of the United States, page 6, section 31, reads as follows:

Before the first meeting of each Congress the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect, and place thereon the names of those persons, and of such persons only, whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively, or the laws of the United States.

The statute of the State of Florida reads as follows:

SEC. 30. When any person shall be elected to the office of elector of President and Vice-President or a Representative in Congress, the governor shall make out, sign, and cause to be sealed with the seal of the State, and transmit to such person a certificate of his election.

This is all the statute law upon this subject. If Mr. Hull has presented to the House the evidence of his election required by this law he must be sworn in. The section of the statute of the State of Florida which I have read is the law which must govern the House in the decision of this case. It will be observed that this section requires that the certificate of a member of Congress elected from the State of Florida shall be made out by the governor of said State; that it shall be signed by him; that he shall cause the same to be sealed with the seal of the State, and that he shall then transmit the same to such person with a certificate of his election.

Now, this certificate was so made out by the governor of the State of Florida and delivered to Mr. Hull. It is in strict conformity with the law in every particular. And he now presents it to this House and asks that he be sworn in as a member. This certificate is the evidence, and the only evidence, which can be legally considered by this House at this time. It has been the practice of this House from its earliest history to admit a person to his seat when he has held a certificate which was in conformity with law, as is the case here. I know of no case to the contrary, when there was no question as to the relation of his State with the Union. This certificate shows upon its face that Mr. Hull was elected on the day prescribed by law. It is the credentials contemplated and pointed out so clearly by the section of the Revised Statutes of the United States which I have quoted. By virtue of that section Mr. Hull presented this certificate to the Clerk of this House, and the Clerk placed his name on the roll, as he was compelled to do, and he is now by virtue of the same law entitled to be sworn in as a member of this House. The certificate is prima facie evidence of his right to his seat, and that, as I have already said, is all that is required.

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. COBB. I have but a few moments, and cannot yield to the gentleman long.

Mr. CALKINS. How can this certificate stand, even as establishing a prima facie right, when the basis upon which it rests has been swept away by a decision of the supreme court of the State of Florida?

Mr. COBB. You cannot go behind this certificate. It is the only evidence which the law warrants this House in considering at this stage of the case. The decision of the supreme court is not a credential under the law, as I have shown. It cannot be considered for any purpose by the House in deciding the prima facie case. To the certificate, and to that alone, we must look for our evidence in deciding this case, because the law is imperative and we must be bound by it. The statute which I have referred to is higher authority than the decision of the supreme court cited by my colleague, for it was enacted for our government in such cases as this, and the decision to which he refers was not intended to and does not in any way affect the validity of Mr. Hull's certificate. No decision of the supreme court of Florida can affect this certificate. And my colleague is too good a lawyer to insist that it does.

Mr. WHITE. Did we not go behind the certificate of the governor of Colorado last year in the contested-election case from that State?

Mr. COBB. The case from Colorado to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers is not a similar one to this. In that case Mr. BELFORD held the certificate of the governor of his State, which showed upon its face that he was elected on the 3d day of October, when the law required that he should have been elected on the 7th day of November. That being the case, his certificate was not prima facie evidence of his election. Indeed it was not such evidence as could control the House. It was not in conformity with law. The House will always look at the certificate and see that it conforms with the law. But I have not time to discuss that case further. No such question arises in regard to Mr. Hull's certificate. It shows upon its face that he was elected on the day prescribed by law, and therefore it is prima facie evidence which entitles him to his seat. To sustain this position I read from McCrary's work on elections, which is admitted by all to be good authority. Its author served as an honored and distinguished member of this House for years. I read section 221, as follows:

> There can be no doubt but that a certificate of election, regular in form and signed by the proper authority, constitutes prima facie evidence of title to the office, which can only be set aside by such proceedings for contesting the election as the law provides. The certificate, whether rightfully or wrongfully given, confers upon the person holding it the prima facie right to the office.

In section 222 the author says:

> The regular certificate of election properly signed is, as we have seen, to be taken as sufficient to authorize the person holding it to be sworn in. It is prima facie evidence of his election, and the only evidence thereof which can be considered in the first instance and in the course of the organization of a legislative body.

Mr. GARFIELD. What page is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. COBB. Page 160. That is the law which governs this case, and there is no escape from it. It has never been disputed. In the early days of our Government, in the organization of this House, Madison and that class of statesmen laid down the same rule and lived up to it strictly. I know of no departure from it.

After Mr. Hull is admitted to his seat upon this certificate the case may then be referred to the Committee of Elections, when a full and fair investigation into the facts may be had. But we cannot go behind the certificate in the organization of the House and examine into the merits of the case. And we should not now discuss the merits because no member of the House knows what the merits of the case are, and cannot until a more full and careful investigation is given than this House is able to give in the process of its organization as it now is. In the case to which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] referred, the question arose as between two certificates, as I remember it. In that case two certificates were presented to the House, one by Hon. ROBERT H. M. DAVIDSON, and the other by William J. Purman. The one was signed by George F. Drew and the other by Marcellus L. Stearns, each claiming to be the governor of the State of Florida at the time he signed the certificate. And the House, after considering the certificates and the circumstances connected with them, decided in favor of the one given by George F. Drew to Hon. ROBERT H. M. DAVIDSON, and he was sworn in as a member. Then the question arose which was the true certificate, and which was entitled to credit by the House. But in this case no such question arises. There is but one certificate presented and it is signed by the governor of the State. No one, not even the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] himself, will deny that the person who signed Mr. Hull's certificate was at the time he signed it the de jure as well as the de facto governor of the State of Florida. Here we have the only evidence we can recognize—the certificate of the governor having attached to it the seal of the State. And we are bound by it under the law which I have read and by all the authorities upon the subject.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] seems to rely greatly on the decision of the supreme court of the State of Florida. Does that gentleman insist, in the face of the law which I have read, that a decision of the supreme court of that State can in any way affect or set aside the certificate of the governor, and thereby destroy the prima facie case made by it in favor of Mr. Hull? If he does, I imagine he will find but few who will agree with him. The gentleman talks about the returning board in Florida. I have heard of the returning boards in Florida and in other States of the South. I think I know something about them; but the returning board of Florida has made its return to the governor of that State, and he has issued his certificate to Mr. Hull certifying that he was elected to the Forty-sixth Congress from the second district. By that certificate we are controlled. We have nothing to do with the action of the returning board, in deciding the question now before us. If this certificate is false it can be corrected hereafter, when the House goes behind the certificate of the governor, as well as the returning board, and examines the merits of the case. But this cannot be done at this time.

We must pursue the uniform rule heretofore followed by this House or we may do great injustice. If after Mr. Hull has been sworn in and a careful examination is made of the merits of the case, which cannot be made now, as I have already said, it is ascertained that Mr. Bisbee is entitltd to the seat, then he will be sworn in, and Mr. Hull will have to surrender the seat to him. But until the merits are reached the certificate entitles Mr. Hull to the seat. The gentleman says that we have before us the certificate made by the returning board of Florida in regard to this district, and that it shows Bisbee was elected. It does not show that Bisbee was elected. In the very certificate to which the gentleman refers, and which is printed in the RECORD, the board certifies that the returns from Brevard County, one of the counties included in said district, was not included in said certificate. Therefore this certificate shows upon its face that it does not contain the true vote of the district for Congress. And yet we are asked to take it as proof of the true result and act upon it. This certificate is said to be the result of the last canvass made by the State canvassing board. And it is insisted that the supreme court of Florida has decided that this last canvass made by said board was the legal one, and that the governor of Florida ought to issue a certificate to Mr. Bisbee. But the governor, having already issued the certificate to Mr. Hull, refuses to issue one to Mr. Bisbee. He is the judge as to whom he will issue the certificate. His judgment is based upon the returns of the election made to him. If he issues a certificate certifying that a certain person has been elected a member of this House, and said certificate is in conformity with law, that makes a prima facie case, and the person must be sworn in

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman has asked two or three questions, how we know certain things. He certainly has not read this morning's RECORD. The record of the court is here on file, is on the record of this House. Any man who will read can learn all these facts which I stated.

Mr. COBB. Does not the gentleman know that the facts to which he alludes are not evidence at this time before this House, and that in no legal sense can they now be considered?

Mr. FRYE. If the gentleman will examine the law of Florida he will find that the certificate of the State canvassing board is higher evidence anywhere than the certificate of the governor.

Mr. COBB. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The law of Florida does not make the certificate of the returning board higher evidence before this House in this case than the governor's certificate. But that law and the law of Congress make the governor's certificate the best evidence upon which this House can act.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. DAVIDSON.]

Mr. DAVIDSON. The facts in this case, Mr. Speaker, are but few, and are, as I understand them, as follows: In November last an election was held for Congressman in the second congressional district of Florida, at which Mr. Hull and Mr. Bisbee were the candidates. The returns from the counties composing the district were duly made, and at the time prescribed by law the board of State canvassers counted or canvassed those returns. The board, owing to certain irregularities and frauds which it was believed had been committed in the counties of Brevard and Madison, laid aside or rejected the returns from those counties and they were not included in the count.

By that count Mr. Hull was elected, and the governor of the State in accordance with law issued to him the usual certificate. Subsequently Mr. Bisbee instituted proceedings in the supreme court of the State, praying that a writ of mandamus might be issued to the board of State canvassers compelling them to make a recount, and particularly to count the returns from the county of Madison. The writ was granted, two of the judges of the court agreeing that it should be done, while one gave a dissenting opinion.

I know not that it is necessary for me to mention here the political faith of the gentlemen composing the supreme court of Florida, but as it has pleased the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to allude to the matter I will likewise do so. Two of the members of that court—the two who decided that the writ of mandamus should be issued—are republicans; the one who gave the dissenting opinion is, I believe, a democrat, or if not a democrat, then he is neutral in politics.

I have said that the writ prayed for was granted, two of the judges concurring and one dissenting, and in my judgment the dissenting judge, in the able opinion which he delivered, sustained the decision of the court which was made in the case of George F. Drew two years ago, while the concurring judges reversed to a great degree that decision.

By the count made in obedience to the writ of mandamus Mr. Bisbee was elected; but he had no certificate from the governor, and that official for good and valid reasons declined to give him one. What then was done? He instituted legal proceedings to compel the governor to issue to him a certificate. What was the result? I answer, the court refused to grant to him the writ prayed for, and he is here to-day asking and demanding a seat in this House without credentials. Now, there is one question which I wish to put or propound to the gentleman from Maine, whose reputation as a lawyer is so well known. If the certificate of the State board of canvassers of Florida is evidence before this body as to the right of a gentleman to take his seat in this House, if such certificate is the only credential which it is necessary for him to have when he comes here to be sworn in, then I ask, why did Mr. Bisbee, who is a lawyer of reputation, institute proceedings in the supreme court of Florida to obtain a certificate from the governor of that State?

Sir, the institution of that suit is convincing evidence to my mind that Mr. Bisbee knew well the importance and value of such a certificate in this House, and that without it his prima facie case here was hopeless. The cases which have been decided by this House for years past have established the principle that a gentleman claiming a seat here, on a prima facie case, should at once be sworn in if his name is on the roll and he presents a certificate in due form and properly authenticated. McCrary, in his valuable work on elections, says in section 222:

The regular certificate of election, properly signed, is, as we have seen, to be taken as sufficient to authorize the person holding it to be sworn in. It is prima facie evidence of his election, and the only evidence thereof which can be considered in the first instance and in the course of the organization of a legislative body.

He further says, in section 221:

The certificate, whether rightfully or wrongfully given, confers upon the person holding it the prima facie right to the office.

Mr. Hull has the required certificate; Mr. Bisbee is altogether without legal credentials; and yet the proposition from the other side of this House is to swear in Mr. Bisbee. It is, in my opinion, a preposterous, unprecedented proposition. I ask gentlemen to reflect what would be the effect should this House seat Mr. Bisbee at this time. The contest is now going on and testimony is being taken in the case. Mr. Bisbee felt that it was necessary to institute and prosecute such a contest. But suppose that he should be seated now, what would be the position of Mr. Hull? Why, the contest would be ended, and he would no longer have any rights in this House, either on a prima facie case or otherwise.

We only ask that, in accordance with the law and the well-established rule and practice of this House, Mr. Hull be permitted now to take his seat. The case will then go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and when it shall have been reported it can be decided and disposed of on its merits. Equity and justice demand that we should not at this stage of the proceedings in the case seat Mr. Bisbee and thereby deprive Mr. Hull of all his rights.

Let me remind this body that in each Congress for the last three years there has been a contest in this House from the second district of Florida. Both in the Forty-third and Forty-fourth Congresses the contestant was a democrat, and though the democrats had a majority in the House in each Congress, yet the contestees, who were republicans, were permitted to hold their seats until the cases were disposed of after reports had been made thereon by the proper committee. I ask that in this case the same course shall be pursued. It is but right and fair that it should be done.

I am surprised that so distinguished a lawyer as the gentleman from Maine should have argued this case now upon its merits before it has been investigated. His whole argument was to the merits of the question, not to the prima facie case. He has introduced here an opinion of a court and the certificate of the State board of canvassers as evidence. I contend that they are not evidence. If we should oust Mr. Hull and seat Mr. Bisbee upon such evidence we will have proceeded on ex parte testimony altogether, for Mr. Hull was not a party to the suit in the supreme court of Florida. He has had no opportunity to introduce testimony, but desires an opportunity to do so before a committee of this House.

I would like to say more, but my time has expired.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I now yield the remaining ten minutes of the half hour to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.]

Mr. BUCKNER. What is the question before this House? It is not whether Mr. Hull or Mr. Bisbee was really elected, but who has the prima facie evidence authorized by law to take a seat in this Hall? That is the question to be determined now.

Mr. Hull has the evidence every other member has who sits here, no more and no less. There is no question but Mr. Hull comes here with a certificate in due form of law, such as I have and such as every other member has whose seat is unquestioned.

Now, why should he be disturbed? I say it is not a question whether he is legally elected, whether when this case is sifted to the bottom by a committee properly authorized by this House, whether under all the facts he is entitled to hold it, but whether he has the legal, presumptive, prima facie evidence of his right to a seat. Unless that is conceded to him no man, then, has a right to be here, and the House would have no power to complete its organization, which is necessary in order that it may go on with the business of the country.

What was the position of our friends on the other side on a case in the last Congress exactly like this, the case of Rainey vs. Richardson, from South Carolina? Rainey came here with the certificate of the governor in due form of law. Facts in the shape of depositions were presented which if they were true proved (and I have them here now before me) that not Mr. Rainey but Mr. Richardson was duly elected and entitled to the seat. But what position did gentlemen on the other side take in reference to that matter? I say that case and this are precisely parallel. There is not a particle of difference between them, and yet the gentlemen on the other side, Mr. Hale of Maine, General Banks of Massachusetts, (who had been for a long time Speaker of this House) General Butler, and other members on the republican side took the view that in accordance with the uniform rule, Mr. Rainey appearing with the certificate of the governor, Mr. Rainey should be seated, although he might be rejected after investigation by the Committee of Elections. He was seated and remained in his seat notwithstanding the Committee of Elections was ready to submit a report against him at the close of the session. Whether that is so, however, I do not know. I have before me, and send to the Clerk's desk to be read, what Mr. Hale and what Mr. Banks said on this very question. Let the Clerk read what Mr. Banks said.

Mr. GARFIELD. From what page of the RECORD is the Clerk reading?

Mr. BUCKNER. It is in the proceedings of the 16th of October, 1878. It is page 63 of the RECORD for that session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BANKS. I submit that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Rainey] ought to be admitted to take the oath as a member of this House, because he has the certificate of his government that he has been elected according to law. There is no reason why the House should not hereafter inquire into the validity of that election. It may make such inquiry the very moment after Mr. Rainey has been admitted upon the certificate. But the very existence of our Government depends upon our recognition of the certificates of State governments to the election of members of this House. We could never organize this House if any member was permitted upon any opinion of his own to impeach the certificates of the governments under which members of this House are elected. Until the last Congress, the precedents of which have been referred to by the gentleman from Virginia, there has never been a single case where this House has set aside, as to the prima facie case, the certificate of a State government to the election of a member of Congress.

Mr. BUCKNER. Now read what Mr. Hale, of Maine, said.

Mr. BELFORD. I understand the gentleman from Missouri to refer to the position taken by republicans in reference to certain gentlemen whose seats were contested.

Mr. BUCKNER. I cannot hear what the gentleman from Colorado is saying.

Mr. BELFORD. I understand the gentleman from Missouri to refer to the position taken by certain republicans in reference to gentlemen who appeared here and whose seats were contested. I desire to ask the gentleman if the position assumed by the democratic side of the House at that time was not this, that while it was the duty of the Clerk in the first instance to enroll a person presenting a credential, yet the House had full, complete, and absolute right to revise the action of the Clerk on that question?

Mr. BUCKNER. I do not understand, Mr. Speaker, that the House took any such position.

Mr. BELFORD. Another question. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the speech made by Mr. MILLS, of Texas, when the question of the credentials of the Representative from the first district of South Carolina was before the House. He announced that to be the true doctrine, that while it was the duty of the Clerk——

Mr. BUCKNER. My time is limited, and I cannot yield further.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the position taken by the gentleman from Texas, whose ability as a lawyer is universally recognized. When the case came up from South Carolina the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] asserted, and it will be found in the twenty-sixth volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 61, that while it was the duty of the Clerk to enroll the party, yet after he had enrolled the party it was within the power of the House to revise the action of the Clerk.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. RODGERS, his private secretary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a message from the President of the United States, which will now be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

The failure of the last Congress to make the requisite appropriations for legislative and judicial purposes, for the expenses of the several Executive Departments of the Government, and for the support of the Army, has made it necessary to call a special session of the Forty-sixth Congress.

The estimates of the appropriations needed, which were sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury at the opening of the last session, are renewed, and are herewith transmitted to both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Regretting the existence of the emergency which requires a special session of Congress at a time when it is the general judgment of the country that the public welfare will be best promoted by permanency in our legislation and by peace and rest, I commend these few necessary measures to your considerate attention.

RUTHERFORD B. HAYES.

WASHINGTON, March 19, 1879.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move that the message of the President be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed for the use of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—HULL VS. BISBEE.

The House resumed the consideration of the contested-election case from the second district of Florida.

Mr. BUCKNER. I could not distinctly hear what was said by the gentleman from Colorado, [Mr. BELFORD.] All I could hear was that he seemed to think there was an incongruity in the views I am now attempting to enforce. I remember well my voting with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] on this proposition, on this very question, and that I voted with the mass of the republicans upon this question.

I suppose that my friend intended to allude to the case from Colorado, and as that has been referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE,] I desire to say that there is no sort of parallelism between this case and the Colorado case.

In the certificate given by the governor of Colorado to Mr. BELFORD there was an express statement by the governor that the election had been held upon an illegal day. It was not, therefore, such a certificate as could be recognized by the Clerk, but here is a certificate conforming in every respect to the law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent to be allowed four minutes, as I have been referred to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The next half hour belongs to the other side upon this question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be heard now. [Loud cries of "Yes!" "Yes!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MILLS. I reiterate, Mr. Speaker, the convictions that I had two years ago, and those convictions have been deepened by the lapse of time, that every member who comes to this House bearing credentials accrediting him as a chosen Representative is a part and parcel of this House, and that he has authority to sit here and participate in the organization of the House is unquestioned, and that no legitimate power can deprive him of that right. Any attempt on the part of this House to deprive any member of the right to participate in the organization of this House, when he brings the regular credentials authorized by the laws of his State, is a wanton and flagrant usurpation of power.

I made the same statement in my speech on the contested-election case from Colorado.

I read from the RECORD of October 25, 1877:

> We have a law in the Revised Statutes conferring upon the Clerk of the House the judicial power to determine what certificates are in compliance with the laws of the States, and those who come here so accredited are declared by that law to be the holders of the prima facie rights to seats and are entitled to organize this House. The Clerk is forbidden to put the names of any others upon the roll, and when he has arranged that roll and passed upon it the question then becomes a judicial question, to be settled only by appealing to the House of Representatives; not by an appeal to any member of the House of Representatives, but to the House itself. Who is the House? All the members present holding proper certificates after they are sworn in and have organized for business by the election of officers. Then it has the power to judge and to render judgment upon each of its members. But until it is organized no member has any power whatever over another, and any attempt to exercise it is a bold and most dangerous assumption of authority.

Now, when a man comes here with that certificate he is a part and parcel of the House, and why should any number of men exclude a member from participating in the organization of the House when he has the credentials and has the same authority which my friend from Tennessee has, and my friend from Ohio?

When the mass of members-elect have joined together and organized the House, then it becomes invested by the Constitution with the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. After it has organized with a Speaker to put questions and take its will, a clerk to keep its journal, it can pass upon the qualifications of its members; but until that time each man bearing a certificate from the governor of his State is entitled to his seat, and no man has the right to deprive any man holding such certificate of his right to a seat upon this floor.

Mr. FRYE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] for ten minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we ought to keep in our minds clearly and plainly the difference between a prima facie right to a seat and the final right to the seat. I understand the claim to be, from the gentleman who has charge of this matter on the other side, that on the prima facie case the gentleman in question shall be sworn in, and that for a full examination of the real merits of the case it shall go to the Committee of Elections.

Ordinarily that would be the true course to pursue. I have many a time insisted in this House on that course. I recollect to have insisted about two years ago, with whatever vigor I could, that here stood a man from Colorado with an unquestioned, genuine certificate of the governor of that State that he was elected a member of this House by an unquestioned majority. We on this side of the House said that he had a right to be sworn in on the prima facie case.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will allow me, did not the certificate of which he speaks state that the person claiming the seat had been elected on a certain day?

Mr. GARFIELD. It stated that he had been elected in accordance with law.

Mr. COBB. And the law of the State provided that the election should take place on the 3d day of October and the law of Congress that it should take place on the Tuesday after the first Monday of November.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot yield my time to the gentleman for an argument. I will say this: the certificate was in full legal form, certifying to the legal facts which are ordinarily certified to in certificates that come here. Mr. BELFORD bore those credentials, and I, in common with my associates on this side of the House, said that he must be sworn in under those credentials, and that if there were any ulterior questions about the legality of the day of election that was a fair matter for investigation and consideration by a committee of this House. I was overruled; all my associates were overruled upon that point. With his certificate as a prima facie case, the whole prima facie case and the case on its final merits were sent to the Committee of Elections, he not being permitted to be sworn in, nor his competitor being permitted to be sworn in, until the committee had acted upon the final merits of the case.

Now, it might be said that in that case the House reversed the rule that a governor's certificate is essential to a prima facie case. I do not think it ought to have reversed it. For one I am willing to go back, if we will go back all around in all cases, to the old rule and the old way. But it will hardly do for gentlemen to go back in the face of their late precedent upon this subject.

That is not all. We are bound, and I think the gentlemen on the other side of the House will admit that they are bound, to pay some attention to the laws of the State from which a credential comes. In most of the States the governor is a part of the returning board. In some of the States he is the sole returning board; that is, I believe, true in regard to Oregon.

In the State of Florida under its laws the governor is no part of the returning board. The returning board is a body independent of the governor. By the law of Florida, which has been quoted here for us, that returning board is empowered to canvass the returns and declare who has been elected. When they have so declared, the secretary is ordered to sign, seal, and publish the declaration, and make public in the newspapers who has been elected.

Now, it is true there is a law of Florida that makes it the duty of the governor as a mere ministerial matter to give a certificate to the man who has been elected. According to a fair construction of the law the governor is to do that only after the real certifying and determining authority has made its declaration of who has been elected.

In this case it appears that on the first count, and before the whole performance of certification and publication by the secretary of state had been gone through with, the governor hastened, out of time, before the moment had arrived when the law made it his duty to do so, and gave the certificate to the gentleman who is now claiming the place here. He did it out of time; he did it before the law had been complied with. It was an illegal certificate; at the time he issued the certificate it was in violation of law.

Immediately upon his doing it the board to revise, correct, and utter the declaration of the count, under the order of the supreme court, did make their revision and did make their declaration, which was signed, sealed, and published by the secretary of state of Florida. That declaration is here before us, made subsequent to this undue, hasty, and illegal certificate of the governor. It is in these words:

> From which canvass it appears that the whole number of votes cast for Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America from the second congressional district of the State of Florida was 21,358, of which Noble A. Hull received 10,578 votes, Horatio Bisbee, jr., received 10,779 votes, and Chandler H. Smith received 1 vote.
> Wherefore it is determined and declared—

That declaration is by the only authority known to the laws of Florida entitled to make a declaration—

> Wherefore it is determined and declared that Horatio Bisbee, jr., is duly elected Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America from the second congressional district of the State of Florida, as shown by such returns.

Now, that paper bears with it on our record the sign-manual of the secretary of state, with the seal of the State; and that is declared by the law of Florida to be evidence in all courts and places whatever.

Mr. BRAGG. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Did not the supreme court of the State of Florida revise the count for presidential electors in the election of 1876, and was not the count, after being thus revised, certified as correct under the direction of the supreme court to the electoral commission; and did not the gentleman from Ohio, as one of the members of that commission, hold that it could not interfere with the governor's certificate?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman has stated precisely what was not done and what did not occur; therefore we have no debate on that question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in continuation of my suggestion on this point, I say that the supreme court of Florida, this case having been carried before it, has invalidated the certificate which Mr. Hull brings here as evidence of his prima facie right. If he brought that certificate here unchallenged by any higher paper, he ought to be sworn in. But we affirm, and we bring the lawful evidence to sustain our position, that the paper he brings here has been invalidated, and is to all intents and purposes of no more value than if it were a forgery. Suppose we could show that the so-called governor's certificate brought here is forged; would gentlemen say that it gave a prima facie right to the seat? Certainly not. But we do show that this certificate is invalidated by the lawful invalidating power of the State, and is therefore stricken out of legal existence; that in law it does not exist, but the thing that does exist is the certificate of the returning board of Florida, which by the law of that State is made the final and complete muniment of title to a seat in this House. On that ground we plant this case.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER. Does the gentleman believe that this House, in examining simply the prima facie title of a gentleman to a seat in this House, has the right to go into the question of the validity of his certificate?

Mr. GARFIELD. Most certainly. Suppose I had presented here a certificate which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] had reason to know was a forgery; suppose he knew that the governor of Ohio never signed that paper, but somebody had forged his name to it; would the gentleman think he had no right to rise and challenge the genuineness and validity of that paper?

Mr. TUCKER. Let me ask this question: suppose you were satisfied that the signature of the governor was authentic and that the seal of the State was authentic; would you go behind the certificate aliunde?

Mr. GARFIELD. If the law of the State provided a mode for invalidating that paper and if that mode had been followed as in this case, then I answer yes. Here is a process by which the paper presented before us has been canceled in law; and it therefore is not a credential.

In concluding these remarks, let me say that for one I want to begin in this new Congress with the utmost fairness; for I fear that we shall all too soon lash up the party tiger; all too soon we shall get hot in these debates; and in my mind it is better for us to begin safely for both sides. Now, for my part, I want to vote, and I think we shall have a chance to vote, for a resolution declaring that in view of the situation of this case neither of these claimants to the seat be sworn in, but that both go before the Committee of Elections for a prompt decision of the right as to the whole case, prima facie and on the merits; for some of us remember too well (we have done it on our side when we were in power, you have done it on your side when you were in power) that a man seated upon the prima facie case, but who had not the ghost of a right to the seat on the merits, has been allowed to occupy the seat for two years lacking one day, and on the last day of the Congress, as a sort of tribute to justice, the right man has been put in.

Now, without going into the merits of this case at all, I suggest to gentlemen on both sides that we let both these gentlemen go before the committee and try their rights; and let us have the earliest possible decision on the whole case. But if anybody is to be sworn in to-day, I desire it shall be the man who does not hold a canceled certificate, but one who holds the highest certificate known to the laws of his State—the certificate of the returning board given under the order of the highest judical tribunal of the State—a certificate that overrides and cancels the certificate of the governor.

Mr. DAVIDSON. How is the certificate of the governor canceled?

Mr. GARFIELD. It is canceled by the decision of the board that had the right under the law to count the votes and was ordered by the supreme court to recanvass them and find the true result.

Mr. DAVIDSON. But when the supreme court was asked to issue a writ commanding the governor to give a certificate to Mr. Bisbee the court refused to grant such a writ.

Mr. GARFIELD. As to that my friend is mistaken. I hold in my hand the opinion of the supreme court. They decided that the governor ought to issue a certificate in accordance with the finding of the board, but they said that under the law they had no power to compel him to do his duty as he ought to do it. One member of the court—a democrat, as I understand—thought that the court had the power to compel him and ought to exercise that power; but the other two judges did not believe that they possessed such power.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Has the gentleman the opinion of that democratic judge here?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have here the opinion of the court.

Mr. DAVIDSON. Ah, the gentleman has the opinion of the court, but not that of the judge who dissented.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why, the dissenting judge not only held that the governor ought to issue a new certificate, but that he ought to be compelled to issue it.

Mr. DAVIDSON. But the gentleman has not here the opinion, which would show the reasoning on which that dissenting judge based his conclusions.

Mr. FRYE. I desire the attention of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Bisbee has so much confidence in the justice of his cause and at the same time so much confidence that any Committee of Elections hereafter to be appointed will deal fairly, justly, and according to law, that he expresses a willingness to accept a proposition to send both these cases to that committee hereafter to be appointed; and I desire to withdraw the resolution which I offered yesterday and to submit in its place, as a substitute for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia, the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the question of the prima facie as well as the final right of Horatio Bisbee, jr., and Noble A. Hull, contestants, respectively, claiming a seat in this House from the second district of Florida, be referred to the Committee of Elections hereafter to be appointed; and until such committee shall have reported in the premises and the House have decided such question, neither of said contestants shall be admitted to a seat.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Of course I cannot control, nor do I desire to control, the action of my friend from Maine. He can withdraw his amendment, and if he chooses shift his ground in the middle of the battle, but that is a question for him. I cannot consent to allow him to offer an amendment to the proposition pending.

Mr. FRYE. I do not understand the previous question has been called and seconded, and I do understand that I have the right to offer this as a substitute for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HOOKER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair.) The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia was to seat Mr. Hull, who has the prima facie right, holding the certificate of the governor of the State of Florida. The gentleman from Maine introduced a counter proposition as an amendment to that which was offered by the gentleman from Virginia, and then, as I understand it, the gentleman from Virginia called the previous question.

The proposition of the gentleman from Maine is to withdraw his amendment offered yesterday to the resolution of the gentleman from Virginia and to substitute instead of it another proposition which has just been read from the Clerk's desk, the effect of which will be, if he should be allowed to offer it, that a member here whether coming from one State or another who holds a certificate of election would be in no better condition than the man who did not have it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the facts they are these: yesterday I offered for the adoption of the House a resolution that Mr. Hull be sworn in and called the previous question, whereupon the gentleman from Maine said that he desired to offer an amendment. For that purpose I yielded to the gentleman, and the amendment was offered. I then insisted on the previous question, proposing to allow an hour for debate afterward. The gentleman from Maine insisted there should be longer time allowed for debate. For myself I preferred that no time should be taken up in debate. We agreed, however, to allow two hours for debate, to be equally divided between the two sides of the House, regarding the previous question as ordered, although there was no distinct understanding on that subject.

Mr. GARFIELD. We did not understand at all that the previous question was ordered or that we consented to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the gentleman from Maine has the right to modify his proposition.

Mr. FRYE. I withdraw the proposition I offered yesterday, and in place of it submit the proposition which has been read from the Clerk's desk. I offer it as a substitute for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia, and will now yield the floor to any gentleman who desires to discuss the question.

Mr. HOOKER. I move to lay the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine upon the table.

Mr. FRYE. I do not yield the floor for that purpose. I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] for the purpose of discussion.

Mr. HOOKER. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. HISCOCK. I agree with gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber that the only question here is, which one of these gentlemen has a prima facie title to a seat upon this floor; and I desire to call attention to this fact that there is no act of Congress which provides upon what credentials a gentleman shall hold his seat here, there is no enactment of Congress which declares what certificate, what evidence shall be received by the Clerk and what evidence shall be received by the House. The only question for the House to pass upon is, which of the applicants appears to have been legally elected? And the question how that fact is to be established has not been defined by any statute of Congress.

Another point I desire to make is: gentlemen have called attention to the certificate of the governor that is to be given or may be given. I say to gentlemen that upon that question they may search through the statutes of Florida in vain to find any law that declares that the certificate of the governor shall afford any evidence of title to a seat on this floor. The statutes of Florida do not declare what shall be the effect of the certificate, what it shall evidence. The governor gives a certificate based on the action of the returning board, for an elector or a member of Congress, as the case may be; but nowhere in the statutes of Florida is it declared what shall be the effect of the certificate, what evidence it shall carry with it.

I desire to call attention to another fact. We find here in the record which is submitted to us that the canvassing board shall make the certificate required, and they shall spread it upon the record. We find again the statute referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] declaring a copy of that certificate shall verify the facts therein contained. You then have two certificates, one from the returning board and one from the governor, each entitled to the same verity as evidence of the facts contained in them, to the same extent, the one as the other.

I again call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Elections of the last House to the fact that neither of the certificates is declared to be evidence on which the House shall act. The law does not say that the man who shall appear to have been legally elected, or elected according to the laws of Florida by either of these certificates, shall be entitled to the seat; if he appears elected by a judgment rendered, which is the highest class of evidence, then I say he is entitled to the seat.

We have heard constantly from the other side of the certificate of the governor. I ask if there is any executive's certificate that the judiciary of the State cannot set aside? The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] and other gentlemen in discussing this question seem to assume that the certificate of the governor imported so much that it verified the fact beyond contradiction and could not be attacked or assailed.

Now let us look at the certificate of the governor. On the face of it he says that he bases it upon the action of the returning board made on the 23d of December, 1878. By virtue of the action of this returning board he gave this certificate. Now, the return of that returning board was attacked in the court. Proceedings were instituted by Mr. Bisbee, and he appealed to the highest court of the State of Florida, and the supreme court of that State reversed the action of the returning board of the State of Florida, said its action was illegal; and that being the case, it and every act predicated upon it must fall to the ground; and then in pursuance of the action of the supreme court, and under its mandate, this same returning board met again and made another certificate, which I say overrides the certificate of the governor. In pursuance of the mandate of the court the board made a new certificate, and that is presented as the evidence of the title of Mr. Bisbee to a seat upon this floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, obtained the floor.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman permit me one word?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will, after I have said a few words myself. This is a very simple question for the consideration of the House. It is a question whether the gentleman who is represented as having been elected by the second district of Florida shall be sworn in or not.

Now the uniform rule from the beginning of the Government to the present time has been that the person holding such a certificate shall be sworn in, and if he was not elected according to the laws of the State, why then the contest can be carried on under the rules prescribed by the statute, and if the facts presented to the House show that he is not rightfully elected, then he is turned out and the rightful claimant put in. The only exception I know of which has been sought to be made to this ruling was two years ago in the case of the members from South Carolina. Their case then was a parallel case to this, running on all fours with this.

They had received the certificate of the governor of South Carolina. The government of South Carolina changed hands. A court was organized and a mandamus issued. The board recounted the returns, and the democratic members came here with the certificates of the board that they were duly elected, or that the parties who held the first certificates were not elected. When that question was raised, a large number of the House on our side agreeing with the gentlemen on the other side, voted to admit the members from South Carolina upon the certificates of the governor, they presenting the prima facie case entitling them to their seats.

Now, let us square this case with that. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract from the law of Florida which I have marked. The only question before us is, are the papers on which Mr. Hull claims the right to be sworn in, in conformity with the law of Florida and the law of the United States?

The Clerk read as follows:

When any person shall be elected to the office of elector of President and Vice-President, or Representative in Congress, the governor shall make and sign and cause to be sealed with the seal of the State and transmit to such person a certificate of his election.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is the law of Florida requiring the governor to issue the certificate of election. I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read the certificate under the great seal of the State, that the House may determine whether it is in conformity or not with the law of Florida.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Tallahassee, Florida.

I, George F. Drew, governor of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that at an election held on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1878, in the several counties of the State of Florida composing the second congressional district of said State for Representative in the Forty-sixth Congress of the United States of America, under an act to provide for the registration of electors and the holding of elections, approved August 6, 1868, and acts amendatory thereto, Noble A. Hull, of the county of Orange, in said State, received a majority of all the votes cast for Representative in the Forty-sixth Congress from the second congressional district of the State of Florida, and was duly elected to be such Representative, as fully appears from a certificate of the State board of canvassers, made under the laws of said State and now on file in the office of secretary of state of said State of Florida.

In testimony whereof I hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of Florida to be affixed, at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 23d day of December, A. D. 1878, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and third year.

GEORGE F. DREW,
Governor of the State of Florida.

By the Governor:
Attest:

W. D. BLOXHAM,
Secretary of State of the State of Florida.

Mr. REED. This certificate of the governor says, "as fully appears from the certificate of the State board of canvassers, made under the laws of said State, and now on file in the office of the secretary of state of said State of Florida." Now I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia if we do not have here the original record which was in the office of the secretary of state, and which shows that that statement in the certificate of the governor is incorrect?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will answer the gentleman further along. I am now arguing the law of the case. I desire to have read the law of the United States on this question, showing that every link in the chain necessary to entitle Mr. Hull to his seat has been supplied, in strict conformity with the laws both of Florida and of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

Before the first meeting of each Congress the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect, and place thereon the names of those persons, and of such persons only, whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively or the laws of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It appears from the papers in the case, and from the law which I have had read, that the governor of Florida is required to issue his certificate of election. Has that been done? If so, and it has been issued in conformity with law, and that appears in this case, there the matter is ended, so far as the prima facie question is involved, and we cannot go beyond it.

It is alleged, on the other hand, however, that the court instituted proceedings by which that certificate is vitiated. The court itself, the majority of the judges, held that they had no power to compel the governor to issue any other certificate. Gentlemen ought to be well familiar with the law and the rule that where an executive or ministerial officer has once discharged his duty, though wrongfully, he cannot recall his act. If he has once issued a certificate he has no right to recall it and issue another.

Now this court, so far as the proceedings before it were concerned, was ex parte. It is to be presumed that Mr. Hull knew nothing of it, and he could not be bound in this House by the action of that court. As gentlemen have made some reference to the matter, I will be pardoned for digressing to state the facts as I understand them. We ought never in these days to refer to the political complexion of a court. I am sorry it has been done in this case; but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] referred to one member of the court as a democrat. I have not seen the opinion of the court, but the gentleman from Florida [Mr. DAVIDSON] tells me that the court is composed of three judges, two of whom are republicans and one is a democrat. Now, we know that courts, like members of Congress, sometimes differ on political questions. The two republican judges directed a mandamus to issue for a recount, and the democratic member dissented from that order. That is all that is worth. Three members of the court; the two republican judges favored the recount; the democratic member of the court opposed it, and gave a dissenting opinion.

In support of the position that this certificate when once given cannot be recalled, I might refer to many authorities. That doctrine is laid down in 1 Cranch and in McCrary on Elections, where a number of cases too numerous for me to refer to are cited. So also in Pennsylvania it has been held that even where a certificate has been given illegally, the officer giving it, having discharged all his functions, cannot recall that certificate and give another.

But gentlemen say that this case is like the Colorado case, to some extent.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. With great pleasure.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to know whether the gentleman is not aware that the present governor of the State of Florida holds his office by virtue of a recount ordered by the supreme court of that State?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I believe that is the fact. But if any man knows the facts in regard to the title of any officer in Florida, or the title of any person growing out of action taken in the State of Florida, it is more than I am able to say, because there has been so much fraud in elections there, so many proceedings like that in "Alachua No. 2," that it is impossible for any one to say whose title is good.

Mr. KEIFER. The title of the present governor is based on the action of the supreme court.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. KEIFER. He holds his office by virtue of a recount ordered by that court.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. As I was saying, gentlemen have referred to the Colorado case. Now, in that case the party on this side of the House occupied precisely the position that we now do. We held that the certificate of the governor, when it was a certificate authorized to be given, was evidence of the prima facie right to a seat; that the party holding such certificate ought to be sworn in. I do not like to refer to any remarks of my own, but as what I said upon the Colorado case will show the spirit of the debate on that question, I desire the Clerk to read a few extracts. It will be seen that the party on this side of the House acknowledged the authority of a governor's certificate when duly given; but in the case of Colorado they held that the governor had no right to issue the certificate, that there was no law of Colorado authorizing him to do so, and that the certificate which he gave showed on its face that the election was held contrary to law. Hence we held that the certificate was void on its face, for it is a principle of law that when a certificate of election descends into particulars the House may look into those particulars to see whether they are in conformity to law.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now I come to notice briefly some remarks of my friend from Maine [Mr. Hale] on that subject. The object of that gentleman is to show that Mr. BELFORD has a prima facie case, and that having a prima facie case he must be sworn in and admitted to a seat on this floor. The law upon that question is so well settled that I scarcely need refer to it; but I shall do so briefly further on. The gentleman says the governor's certificate constitute's a prima facie case. Now the governor's certificate makes a prima facie case only when that certificate is authorized by law and the party giving it has a right to issue it. It is not every paper that purports to be a certificate of election that gives the party named in it the right to a seat on this floor. It must be a paper issued under due authority of law by an officer having authority to issue it.

* * * * * * *

Therefore there is no authority of law, except by implication for the governor to give his certificate of the election of a member of Congress.

* * * * * * *

I have just said that I admit in regard to the State officers that the schedule of the State constitution provides that the same methods and rules shall be pursued in canvassing and announcing the result as in the Territory. But that does not carry with it by implication of law the right of the governor to issue a certificate of election of members of Congress for the State. He must have special authority to do that. It was a special statute of the Territory of Colorado which gave him the right to issue a certificate to the territorial Delegate. That special statute was neither referred to nor re-enacted by the constitution of the State.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to one point in the Colorado case which he seems to have overlooked. Colorado was admitted into the Union by proclamation of the President on the 1st of August, 1876. In October of the same year that State elected a Representative to the Forty-fourth Congress. He came here with his credentials under the seal of the State. Those credentials, which avouched the fact that he had been duly and legally elected as a Representative, were presented to this House and were referred to the Committee of Elections, and no report was made for two or three months after that time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The extract which has been read from my remarks indicates that on this side of the House we occupied the same position then that I occupy now: that a certificate given by the proper officer gave to the party holding it the right to be sworn in. But the point in that case was that there was no such certificate; that the governor of Colorado had no right to give a certificate, and when he did give it it was blank paper.

Mr. REED. Is not that the case here? Has not the certificate held by Mr. Hull become blank paper by the action of the supreme court of the State of Florida?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No, sir. By the law of Florida the governor had the right to give the certificate which he has given.

Mr. SPRINGER. In the case of Colorado the Clerk decided that the certificate on its face showed that the member holding it had not been elected on the day prescribed by law. For that reason, and for that reason only, the Clerk refused to place the name of the gentleman from Colorado upon the roll of the House.

Mr. BELFORD. I was not speaking of the certificate presented by the party claiming to have been elected to the Forty-fifth Congress. I was speaking of the certificate presented by the gentleman elected to the Forty-fourth Congress, which certificate was regular on its face, the election having been held agreeably to the act of Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. The decision of this House in the Colorado case is precisely in accord with what this side of the House now insist upon. We hold that we must be governed by the face of the certificate. In the Colorado case the face of the certificate showed that the person claiming the benefit of that certificate had been voted for upon a day unknown to the law, and therefore could not have been properly and legally elected.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will detain the House but a moment longer.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to correct the gentleman from Illinois. I am speaking of the certificate of the Forty-fourth Congress and not of the Forty-fifth Congress. There was no question about the legality of the day when the Representative was elected in the Forty-fourth Congress; that was a question which grew up in reference to the admission of the member in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. In the Forty-fourth Congress the member was not admitted until the second session. Then the ground of objection was that the State had not been admitted into the Union when the election was held for Representative in Congress.

Mr. BELFORD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to proceed. The question is so well settled that the person holding the proper credentials is entitled to a seat that I will not discuss it any further.

The gentleman from Ohio on my right [Mr. GARFIELD] proposes in amiable mood to let the case lie over to be considered by the Committee of Elections when appointed. This case is now under contest, and the first forty days have not expired and the case will not be matured for the next sixty or eighty days and cannot get before the country or the House until the next session of Congress, the effect of which will be to leave that district unrepresented from now until then. The law says pending the contest that the party having the prima facie case shall be seated. I will not detain the House, for my voice is failing from a severe cold, by reading the authorities but will merely cite them:

If the office were to remain vacant pending the contest, it might frequently happen that the greater part of the term would expire before it could be filled, and thus the interests of the people might suffer, &c. (McCrary's American Law of Elections, sec. 204.)

Rule, that the person holding the ordinary credentials shall be qualified and allowed to act pending a contest, and until a decision can be had on the merit. (Ibid, sec. 204.)

It is sufficient if the claimant to an office presents a certificate signed by the officer or officers authorized by law to issue credentials, &c. (Ibid, sec. 205.)

It is enough for a prima facie case if the certificate comes from the proper officer of the State, &c. (Ibid, sec. 208. See also sec. 207.)

The issuing of the commission by the governor to Mr. Hull has conferred upon him a vested right which cannot be taken away except after the case has been heard upon its merits. (Sec. 209.)

The person duly commissioned must exercise the functions of the office until upon an investigation upon the merits, &c. (Sec. 210.)

There can be no doubt but that a certificate of election regular in form and signed by the proper authority constitutes prima facie evidence of title to the office. (Sec. 221.)

The certificate, whether rightfully or wrongfully given, confers upon the person holding it the prima facie right to the office. (Sec. 221. See also sec. 222.)

I will yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I think the House of Representatives ought not to undertake to try the merits of a case like this. Our Committee of Elections is organized for that purpose. Our business is to judge by the face of the certificate. I had the honor to vote for my friend from Colorado, [Mr. BELFORD,] one of three men on this side of the House, because I knew that he came here with a prima facie case in holding the certificate of the governor of Colorado. I gave him that vote in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. COX. I have not made a point yet, and cannot yield. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York decline to yield?

Mr. COX. I decline. The moment I make a sharp point I will yield to my friend. [Laughter.] I say when I hear my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and he is just coming on the floor now, showing some little remorse for bad conduct in the past and asking us to begin anew in a democratic House, I think, perhaps, they ought to have begun earlier to be just to this side of the House in matters of election. [Laughter.] I remember when a gentleman from Massachusetts, now a Senator, in a tract he issued or delivered to a university made the confession that the republican party for years and years had made injudicious and unjudicial decisions as to these election contests. I remember when a certificate was sent into this House from the State of Virginia, indorsed by gentlemen on the other side, with some forty-five voters, only signed by a justice of the peace, at Ball's Cross Roads, electing a man to Congress as to whom I heard said that he was a citizen of Ohio when he was elected to Congress from Virginia. When you voted such men in, all I have to say is your remorse ought to have begun earlier and your penitence ought to have been more sedate. [Laughter.]

What is this case now before the House? The point is in what the Clerk said to us yesterday. Here is a copy of a canvass of the votes of the second district of Florida at an election on the 5th of November. It was made by the board of State canvassers in pursuance of an order of the supreme court; but it was not accompanied by any governor's certificate. The governor's certificate, which is the prima facie evidence, is held by Mr. Hull. The point lies in a nutshell, as was said on the other side of the House. We have here the governor's certificate certifying to Mr. Hull's election; and when his election is certified here and his name placed on the roll there can be no opposition made to his taking his seat, except by the Committee of Elections when we send the case there, and there the matter can be tried and there only.

Mr. SPRINGER obtained the floor.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask my colleague from New York a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York has yielded the floor, but I may yield to the gentleman when I have concluded what I have to say. But I prefer to proceed now, as I shall speak very briefly. I desire to say that the question raised by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] was fully settled by an authority which I deem good for the other side of the House, however much it may be questioned by this side.

I ask the Clerk to read the extract which I have marked, it being a part of the decisions of the electoral commission in the case of the State of Florida. The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was a member of that commission, as was also my friend from Virginia who sits before me, [Mr. HUNTON.]

The Clerk read as follows:

The ground of this decision, stated briefly, as required by said act, is as follows: That it is not competent under the Constitution and the law as it existed at the date of the passage of said act to go into evidence aliunde on the papers opened by the President of the Senate in the presence of the two Houses to prove that other persons than those regularly certified to by the governor of the State of Florida, in and according to the determination and declaration of their appointment by the board of State canvassers of said State prior to the time required for the performance of their duties, had been appointed electors, or by counter-proof to show that they had not, and that all proceedings of the courts or acts of the Legislature or of the executive of Florida subsequent to the casting of the votes of the electors on the prescribed day are inadmissible for any such purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have caused this decision to be read, being a part of the decision of the electoral commission, for the purpose of showing that in the case now before the House the certificate is prima facie evidence of the right of Mr. Hull to his seat, and that it is not competent to go behind the certificate of the governor of the State of Florida, which is admitted to be regular in every respect. The only difference between this side of the House and the other side in regard to the decision of the electoral commission was that we contended that in that case the Houses of Congress had the right to go behind the returns and investigate the merits of the case as to whether the Hayes or Tilden electors had been chosen in conformity with law. But we all agreed that in a prima facie case such as that now before the House we could not go behind the certificate of the governor. It was held by the electoral commission that it was not competent to go behind the governor's certificate even to consider a decision of the supreme court annulling such certificate, or even to consider a solemn act of the Legislature of the State of Florida which invalidated the governor's certificate and the action of the State canvassing board. The gentlemen upon the other side cannot now consistently hold that they can go behind the face of the certificate in this case, and consider evidence aliunde, although that evidence may tend to show that the certificate ought not to have been issued.

In the case before the House the member claiming a seat upon this floor comes here with precisely the same evidence of his right to a seat which every other member has. We can no more question his right to a seat than we can question our right to the seats we occupy. Our duties now are merely ministerial. We are not deciding the merits of the case as to whether Mr. Hull or Mr. Bisbee was rightfully elected, but only the question as to who has the certificate of the governor. It is admitted that there was a controversy in Florida as to who should obtain the certificate. It is not for us now to say whether the governor decided rightly or wrongly. He had a right to decide the matter, and under his responsibility as the chief executive officer of the State he has given the certificate to Mr. Hull. That certificate is binding upon this House in the first instance. It determines Mr. Hull's right to the seat pending the contest before the House upon the merits of the election. The case, it seems to me, is free from all doubt.

I now, Mr. Speaker, move the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will yield to me, I think it will be only justice to allow five or ten minutes each to the parties in interest. I understand they desire it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only offered it as a suggestion.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I must ask for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to the gentleman that the parties in interest be allowed ten minutes each. I understand they desire it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I cannot yield for that purpose. It is unusual to allow the parties to be heard at this stage of the case.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only offered this suggestion as a request coming from the parties themselves.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I believe it has never been done in a prima facie case. I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 126, noes 115.

The main question was then ordered, being upon the substitute offered by Mr. FRYE.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question was put upon Mr. FRYE's amendment; and on a division there were—ayes 122, noes 125.

Mr. FRYE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 140, not voting 8; as follows:

NOT VOTING—8.

Camp,	Chittenden,	Morse,	Stephens,

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. KENNA. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, who is necessarily absent on account of sickness in his family, is paired with Mr. MORTON, of New York. If my colleague were present, he would vote "no."

Mr. COX. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. CAMP. If he were present, I would vote "no" and he would vote "ay."

The SPEAKER. The Chair interrupts the roll-call for the purpose of swearing in a member.

Mr. LORING then appeared and was sworn in.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the following resolution, submitted by Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia:

Resolved, That Noble A. Hull be now sworn in as a Representative in this Congress from the second district of the State of Florida.

Mr. GARFIELD. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

NOT VOTING—9.

Camp,	Morse,	Stephens,	Wilson,
Caswell,	Morton,	Stevenson,	Wright.
Cox,

So the resolution of Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, was adopted.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. KENNA. My colleague, Mr. WILSON, is necessarily absent on account of sickness in his family. He is paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. MORTON.

Mr. HISCOCK. My colleagues, Mr. COX and Mr. CAMP, are paired. Mr. COX, if present, would vote "ay" and Mr. CAMP "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask that Mr. Hull be now sworn in as Representative from the second district of Florida.

Mr. NOBLE A. HULL presented himself, and was duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed in section 1757 of the Revised Statutes.

COMMITTEE ON RULES.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the Committee on Rules:

The Speaker, ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS of Georgia, JOSEPH C. S. BLACKBURN of Kentucky, JAMES A. GARFIELD of Ohio, and WILLIAM P. FRYE of Maine.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. DOWNEY.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House documents of the Forty-fifth Congress not yet distributed be delivered to members of the present House.

Mr. CARLISLE. I inquire of the gentleman whether, under this resolution, the bound reports and documents of the last Congress, which properly belong to members of that Congress, would not be distributed to the new members of the present House?

Mr. GARFIELD. That might possibly be the construction, though it was not so intended.

Mr. CONGER. I think the resolution had better lie over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the resolution will lie over.

There was no objection.

PRINTING OF ESTIMATES.

The SPEAKER. The order made this morning in reference to the printing of the President's message authorized the printing of the usual number of copies of the estimates transmitted by the President to the House. The Chair thinks that the usual number, fifteen hundred, would be largely in excess of any requirement, and he suggests that the execution of this portion of the order be left discretionary with the Chair until upon proper inquiry the number of copies actually needed can be ascertained.

Mr. CLYMER. There is no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the order to print will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BALLOU: The petition of women of South Smithfield, Rhode Island, that the anti-polygamy law of 1862 may be made effective—to the Committee on the Territories, when appointed.

By Mr. BOUCK: The petition of Anson Dart, for additional pay for services as superintendent of Indian affairs on the Pacific coast—to the Committee of Claims, when appointed.

By Mr. CARLISLE: The petition of General Leslie Coombs, of Kentucky, for an increase of his pension as an officer in the war of 1812 and for other relief—to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, when appointed.

By Mr. COX: The petition of Thomas Shiels and others, citizens of New York, for the amendment of the shipping laws—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

Also, the petition of 70,000 citizens of the United States, for the amendment of the postal laws relating to the transmission of obscene literature—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, when appointed.

By Mr. DUNNELL: The petition of William P. Spooner and 30 others, citizens of Freeborn, Minnesota, for the passage of the Reagan interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

Also, the petition of J. Utley and 20 others, citizens of Preston, Minnesota, of similar import—to the same committee, when appointed.

By Mr. HILL: The petition of S. E. Root and others, of Fulton County, Ohio, of similar import—to the same committee, when appointed.

Also, the petition of T. C. Derbin and others, of Williams County, Ohio, of similar import—to the same committee, when appointed.

By Mr. STONE: The petition of the members of Monterey Grange, Michigan, of similar import—to the same committee, when appointed.

By Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois: The petition of citizens of Franklin County, Illinois, that pensions be granted soldiers of the Mexican war—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, when appointed.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 20, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PADDOCK. By mistake yesterday a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for the establishment of a military post east of Fort Robinson, on the Niobrara River, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I ask that the reference may be corrected, and that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which has already considered the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That change of reference will be made.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President——

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say, with the leave of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] that the joint resolution (S. R. No. 2) to provide for the enforcement of the eight-hour law, which was introduced by him yesterday, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It should have been referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as that committee has always had the subject before it. I ask, therefore, to have the reference changed.

Mr. WALLACE. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To this the Chair hears no objection.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to interpose a suggestion that we adjourn until Monday?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, will the Senate now adjourn?

The motion was agreed to; and (at twelve o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 20, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. MORRISON. The Journal, as I understood its reading, recites that the Speaker by unanimous consent appointed a Committee on Rules. I do not think any such thing occurred, though I make no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The Chair did not ask unanimous consent, supposing that there would be no objection to the appointment of the Committee on Rules, since there had been introduced into the House propositions in reference to that subject.

Mr. MORRISON. I make no objection; but as a rule I think the Journal ought not to recite what did not occur.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected. The appointment could only be made by unanimous consent. The Chair, however, did not ask such consent.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce, for reference to a special committee, a bill to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the introduction of bills.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS IN CINCINNATI.

Mr. McMAHON. I now call up the question which was left pending on Tuesday last in reference to certain congressional elections in the city of Cincinnati. I desire to state that I have no wish to have printed in the RECORD the petition, the reading of which I have asked for. My object in presenting this question to the House is to get it before the appropriate committee and in the usual form. If gentlemen on the other side are willing, I will submit a resolution for that purpose without having the papers read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read for information only.

The SPEAKER. It will be understood that all rights are reserved.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the memorial of John Follett, Alexander Long, John A. Shank, John G. Fratz, and others, electors residing in the first and second congressional districts of the State of Ohio, touching the election of BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH and THOMAS L. YOUNG as members of the House of Representatives to represent said districts in this House, with the accompanying papers, be printed and referred to the Committee of Elections when the same shall have been appointed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the making of any point upon this resolution I desire to suggest to my colleague that the petition in this case is, as I am informed, a petition for the repeal of certain statutes; it does not ask for the unseating of the members named in the resolution—does not raise at all the question of their title to seats. It is an ordinary petition asking for the repeal of certain laws. It seems to me in that case it ought to go to the appropriate committee; for instance, to the Judiciary Committee. If the gentleman chooses to refer the whole subject there certainly will be no objection here.

I have received and will read for the information of my colleague a suggestion which has come to me by telegram, signed by three prominent citizens of the city of Cincinnati. It is addressed to me, and reads in this way:

Would advise reference of Butterworth papers to select committee of five, with instructions to investigate operation of supervisor law in this city last October. Election was absolutely fairest ever held here, and can be so proved.

RICH'D SMITH.
W. M. BATEMAN.
AMOR SMITH, JR.

I read that for the information of my colleague, and in the absence of any of the standing committees of this House I would suggest to my colleague that he raise a select committee and refer these papers to them, and empower them to make whatever investigation in regard to that election and the operation of those laws he sees fit. I will say to him there will be no opposition on this side of the House to such an investigation.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to read for the information of my colleague from Ohio a dispatch that I have received from Cincinnati, dated March 19. It is as follows:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, March 19, 1879.

DEAR SIR: Having read in the morning papers a copy of the memorial presented by you to the House of Representatives on yesterday, we desire to say that had the said memorial been presented to us for our signature we would have signed the same with the gentlemen whose names appear attached thereto, and we hereby authorize you to attach our names to the said memorial.

Respectfully,

Julius Reis, J. Kiersted, J. J. Bumpus, E. B. Ludwick, Geo. Britton, Simon Straus, Henry Bertling, John J. Farrell, Wm. E. Walker, Fred. Benninger, E. M. Bemiss, John Hagerty, John H. Garrison, A. R. Vonniarteles, P. T. Scahill, Frank Rattermann, Jos. Seiter, A. Hoffmann, T. Buckley, Wm. Lemmons, Charles McDevitt, W. B. Hobbie, L. W. Newman, W. A. Seiter.

Hon. JOHN A. MCMAHON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope my colleague will have unanimous consent to add those names to the memorial.

Mr. McMAHON. I think they are already in the RECORD.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask also——

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman from Ohio know the handwriting of these parties. If he does, of course he can ask that their names shall be added. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I also ask to read the following dispatch from Cincinnati:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, March 18, 1879.

THOMAS YOUNG,
House of Representatives:

My name was signed to petition to oust you by misrepresentation. Have telegraphed Sayler to erase it. See him.

W. B. CASSILLY.

I think that should be done; that the name should be erased.

Mr. McMAHON. That erasure was made yesterday by myself.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand ten others of the twenty-two have sent a telegram—not in my possession, but I believe it is in the House—saying their names were procured under misrepresentation and that they should be erased.

Mr. McMAHON. I have had read the names of twenty-four who state they have read the memorial in the newspapers, and also ask that their names shall be signed to the memorial. If any such dispatches have been received, let them be produced and read.

Mr. GARFIELD. But let us have the record corrected so far as it goes.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask my colleague to yield to me to make a suggestion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will yield to my colleague for that purpose.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish in this connection, in order that we may misrepresent nobody, none of these original twenty-three prominent citizens of Cincinnati, to read a telegram.

Mr. McMAHON. I have no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. I read it because it comes from one of the most distinguished of the twenty-three, a prominent lawyer of Cincinnati, a very elegant gentleman, a distinguished democrat also.

Mr. McMAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me read the dispatch:

CINCINNATI, OHIO, March 19, 1879.

Governor THOMAS L. YOUNG,
Member of Congress:

Did not read memorial. Signed it as a protest and as looking to repeal of supervisors law. I charge no fraud upon the part of yourself or BUTTERWORTH or in your interest, and have no knowledge upon which to base any.

JOHN A. SHANK.

Mr. McMAHON. Now I want to ask my colleague from the State of Ohio whether he is acquainted with Alexander Long, of the city of Cincinnati?

Mr. KEIFER. I remember well his condemnation on the floor of this House during the war.

Mr. McMAHON. I wish to ask the gentleman if he is not the peer in character, in intelligence, and in standing, in the city of Cincinnati, of any member of this House?

Mr. KEIFER. Is the gentleman inquiring about the moral character of Alexander Long? If he is, I say with great pleasure that I believe it to be very high.

Mr. McMAHON. Is the gentleman acquainted with Mr. John F. Follett?

Mr. KEIFER. I know him very well.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is it in order to move to take a recess, to let the members of the State of Ohio settle the claims to respectability of her citizens? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Not to interfere with the appropriation bills. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMAHON. The question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is exceedingly pertinent to the inquiry. I take it that all men who send a petition to the House of Representatives stand upon an equal footing until the contrary is shown, and when one chooses to withdraw his name out of twenty-three others it does not weaken the petition in any particular.

The remark I make is only in answer to the statement of my colleague in regard to the character of one of these petitioners, and I can concur with him in saying that he is a high-minded gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. If my colleague will allow me a moment at this point, I desire to say that the memorial is an ordinary memorial asking Congress to repeal certain laws.

My understanding is from the dispatches which have been received from the memorialists, that the memorialists who signed these papers did so without knowledge of the affidavits appended thereto. The affidavits themselves, it is alleged by gentlemen who know, were procured under disreputable circumstances, and the memorial and the affidavits ought to be separated entirely. I trust that my suggestion to my colleague will commend itself to the sense of justice of the House, and that under the circumstances a special committee will be appointed on my colleague's own motion to investigate this particular matter, and we shall certainly agree most heartily.

Mr. McMAHON. The efforts made in advance to prejudice whatever there may be of truth in this memorial are not properly made. I have stated already that I know nothing about these statements; that I only know what the memorialists allege; but I desire to say that my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has raised a question, I think without authority, as to the character of the witnesses whose affidavits are attached to this memorial.

I hold in my hand a letter from a gentleman who is an ex-judge of the court of Cincinnati, and who is known to be a gentleman of the highest character, who says to me, under his own hand, that he is personally acquainted with most of the persons who make these affidavits. He says that those known to him are credible and worthy men.

Mr. CONGER. Does he certify to the pardon of those who have been convicted?

Mr. McMAHON. I decline to answer the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment? I desire to make a statement which I think is quite pertinent to this question. I will be very brief.

Mr. McMAHON. Before the gentleman makes his statement I want to say to my colleague from the nineteenth district [Mr. GARFIELD] that I would have no objection to a special committee, if the memorialists did not specifically charge that these parties are not entitled to their seats.

I have what I suppose to be a correct copy of the memorial in my hand. Almost every one of the specifications is based upon corrupt practices by deputy marshals. But the memorial distinctly raises a question of the validity of the election. I will read:

> And your memorialists further represent that BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH and THOMAS L. YOUNG, claiming to have been elected to represent the congressional districts above mentioned, were not so elected by a majority of the legal and qualified voters of said congressional districts, but, on the contrary thereof, your petitioners charge that gangs of repeaters were organized in their interest, and that by means of a large number of illegal votes cast by said gangs of repeaters said BUTTERWORTH and YOUNG, including the candidates upon the republican ticket, were returned as having been elected.

In the prayer these memorialists ask Congress to take such other measures, besides the repeal of the supervisors law, as the facts may require. Now, I think it proper and right that this memorial should go to the Committee of Elections. It is really an election case. It is not a mere question of investigation; it is an election case brought by a number of reputable citizens who claim that the purity of elections has been violated. Whether they have reputable witnesses and facts to carry out what they assert I do not know and never have stated. I have simply performed a duty in bringing the papers, as the representative of the next congressional district, to the attention of the House. The memorialists undoubtedly believe they have proof of a convincing character to establish their charges; and they are men of high standing.

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague will see that my suggestion is precisely in the line of his argument. The Committee of Elections is appointed to act upon cases brought here with testimony before them. We have never known a case yet, I think, where the Committee of Elections have been sent out to make a general investigation on the conduct of the whole election; that is a matter of special investigation, and when a special examination cannot be made as to the facts, then it might be proper to refer the case to a special committee for investigation.

What my colleague now suggests would send the Committee of Elections away from the Capitol for the purpose of making an investigation concerning the general conduct of an election. That certainly is unusual. I think he will see that his object will be best reached by the appointment of a special committee to investigate the subject, the result of such investigation to be laid before whatever committee this House may designate.

Mr. McMAHON. If this subject is referred to the Committee of Elections, as I suggest, that committee may come to the conclusion that it would be proper to have a special committee to investigate the matter, and may come into the House and ask that that be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House certainly can judge of that now. The ordinary course in such matters here is this: when any man in his place asks for an investigation of anything germane to the business of this House such investigation usually has been granted.

Here in this case we tender the fullest opportunity for investigation. I will say this, in connection with other matters, that the affidavits submitted by my colleague [Mr. McMAHON] are not affidavits in fact—they are mere ex parte statements under the cover of an ordinary ex parte oath. They are extrajudicial; not one of them would be of the slightest consequence before any court in the world, not even before a grand jury. Therefore, what we want is, first of all, testimony upon this subject, taken not ex parte, but with both sides heard, such testimony to be laid before this House for its action.

Mr. McMAHON. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] this: I will accept his proposition if he will give to that special committee a clerk and clothe it with power to sit during the recess and vacation for the purpose of taking testimony.

Mr. GARFIELD. So far as I am concerned I will consent to that. We court the fullest investigation of that election.

Mr. McMAHON. Then I will modify the resolution.

Mr. KEIFER. I ask my colleague to yield to me for a statement.

Mr. McMAHON. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes; I do not want to lose my right to the floor.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not desire to prolong this discussion. I am not sure in what form the proposition is to be submitted to the House. I wish to say a few words in reference to this sort of memorial, and more particularly in reference to the affidavits attached, or the papers purporting to be affidavits. My colleague seems to put stress upon the character of the men who signed this memorial. From the short delay we have had in this matter we have learned that many of these persons repudiate utterly having signed any such memorial as the gentleman asked to have read and referred to a committee of this House. I know the gentleman has himself indorsed these supposed memorialists. I know, however, that the man who certifies to all these affidavits save three is a man whom no person living in the city of Cincinnati who knows him would recognize either in public or in private.

And I want to say more; that these are not original affidavits. No person comes here with an affidavit except upon the certificate of one Tom Shay, of Cincinnati. Whether there has ever been an affidavit made, except possibly in three instances, is doubtful; and I think my colleague [Mr. McMAHON] will agree with me that those three are not original documents. They come here certified by Tom Shay, of Cincinnati, without any authority on his part to certify papers that he calls affidavits. We are asked here in the House of Representatives and in the Congress of the United States to act as though we had something that was tangible to act upon. Permit me to say that these affidavits were obtained by sending around through Cincinnati and hunting up men, only three or four of whom are yet known, and getting them to sign something; that is if Tom Shay did not sign them all himself. And the man who went around and prepared these papers was a man recently discharged from the penitentiary of the State of Ohio; Jim White is his name.

Mr. McMAHON. Has not the five minutes expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. KEIFER. One word further. This memorial, taking it for granted that it is a memorial, was signed by gentlemen of Cincinnati; and it now seems that one of the most astute and one of the brightest of those whose names purport to be signed to the memorial repudiates the signing of it, and others have withdrawn in some form.

The memorial is not a memorial on the subject of a contest of anybody's seat in this House. It does not go to the question of the election of anybody to the Congress of the United States; it is a memorial with a prayer asking the Congress of the United States, not the House of Representatives, to repeal the election laws——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Was my time limited?

The SPEAKER. To five minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to say a final word. I vote for this investigation, not because of the memorial, not because of the affidavit, but because a Representative on this floor, rising in his place, and in his own right and on his own responsibility, alleges that there are things that need investigation. It is on the faith of what my colleague [Mr. McMAHON] offers as his opinion in the case that I vote for the investigation.

I do not hold that any citizen of the United States has a right to demand the investigation merely on his individual say so. The time was in Congress when even one man rising in his place and saying on his honor that he believed a certain officer of the Government ought to be investigated, the request was not granted unless some other man said, "I also on my responsibility state that I believe this thing ought to be done." But we have gone further than that now, and I am willing to vote for an investigation when one man in this House asks it.

Mr. KEIFER. My colleague will allow me to say that if he modifies his resolution I shall be very glad to vote for it.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to state to my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] that I offer this resolution under parliamentary law, not under any rules of the House, because we have no rules at present. I have risen in my seat to perform one of the most solemn duties that a Representative can perform—to present to this House a petition signed by persons whom I know to be reputable and respectable citizens. I do this in the interest of the purity of elections, in the interest of good government. I perform an unpleasant duty, which I would be glad to avoid; but I am satisfied that in performing my duty as a Representative I cannot violate the courtesy due from one member to another.

I do not care upon what ground my distingnished colleague may vote for the resolution. If he votes for it, well and good; if he does not, that is a matter for him. But I modify the resolution because he has said he is willing to vote for it, so modified, and I have put the resolution in such a shape as to provide for investigation. I think it due to my colleagues from the city of Cincinnati [Mr. BUTTERWORTH and Mr. YOUNG] to say to them that in view of the publication of these matters the fullest and freest investigation ought to be provided for, and I am sure it will be.

As to the assaults which are made upon individuals by my other colleague, [Mr. KEIFER,] I want to know where he finds his authority in parliamentary law to discuss the merits of a matter which has not yet been read, and to attack upon the floor of this House, without testimony, the character of the persons who have signed this memorial. Permit me to say to him in all kindness that the gentlemen who signed the memorial, and who authorized and directed me to prosecute this matter in the House, are in intelligence, in capacity, in honesty and integrity, and in singleness of purpose the peers not only of the gentleman from the Springfield district of Ohio, but of any other member on the floor of this House.

Mr. KEIFER. I have not attacked them.

Mr. McMAHON. And when he undertakes to throw a slur upon this proceeding because of his opinion in regard to one particular person who may have taken these affidavits or certified to the copies, he forgets that these memorialists—Hon. Alexander Long, John Follet, Mr. Fratz, Mr. Bernard, and others, who occupy responsible positions in the city of Cincinnati—say to this House, in the memorial, that they are ready to present to the House the original affidavits upon which it is founded. I hold them now in my hand, ready to be referred to any committee this House may choose to appoint.

Mr. KEIFER. They have never been offered to the House.

Mr. McMAHON. I now offer the resolution as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the memorial of John Follet, Alexander Long, John G. Fratz, and others, electors residing in the first and second congressional districts of the State of Ohio, touching the election of BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH and THOMAS L. YOUNG as members of the House of Representatives to represent said districts in this House, with the accompanying papers, be printed and referred to a select committee of seven members, with power to sit during the recess, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to employ a clerk and stenographer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope my colleague will omit the clause providing for printing "the accompanying papers." Let the memorial be printed, but the affidavits, which are ex parte and extrajudicial, ought not to be printed now. Let them be merely referred. I now ask my colleague to allow the gentleman from Cincinnati [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] to say a word before the resolution is voted on.

Mr. McMAHON. I have no objection to the modification suggested by my colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The SPEAKER. In what manner does the gentleman desire to have the resolution modified?

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be modified so that the memorial shall be printed and the accompanying papers merely referred.

Mr. McMAHON. The intent is that the committee shall have power to sit after the adjournment of the present session; perhaps the word "recess" is not sufficient; let the words "or vacation" be inserted after the word "recess."

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the Clerk now read the resolution as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the memorial of John Follet, Alexander Long, John G. Fratz, and others, electors residing in the first and second congressional districts of the State of Ohio, touching the election of BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH and THOMAS L. YOUNG as members of the House of Representatives to represent said districts in this House, be printed and referred to a select committee of seven members, with power to sit during the recess or vacation, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to employ a clerk and stenographer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the resolution makes no provision for the payment of the expenses of the inquiry.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to my colleague that he ought to add a clause providing for the payment of the expenses of the investigation out of the contingent fund. In the mean time, while the form of the resolution is being perfected, I ask my colleague to yield to our colleague from Cincinnati, [Mr. BUTTERWORTH.]

Mr. CARLISLE. The resolution ought to be so modified that the memorial shall be printed, and the accompanying papers, as well as the memorial, referred to the committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is right.

Mr. KEIFER. I think that we had better refer only original papers—not papers coming from any unauthorized party. If the original affidavits which these persons claim to have are to be put in, I do not object. Certainly the gentleman from Kentucky does not want certified copies from unauthorized parties. Let the original papers come in.

Mr. FRYE. It is nothing but a farce, any way.

Mr. KEIFER. Let us make it as respectable as possible.

Mr. FRYE. It is the unnecessary expenditure of $20,000.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Let us suspend payment until we see the value of the investigation.

Mr. McMAHON. If gentlemen on that side request a special committee they ought not to complain if I have complied. I proposed to refer these matters to the Election Committee. I have no doubt the memorialists will be glad to have the special committee, with the full powers of a committee of the House. But gentlemen must not grumble when I grant their own request. I want to accommodate them as far as I can.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the resolution to be read with the suggested modification for payment out of the contingent fund for the expenses which may be incurred.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the memorial of John Follet, Alexander Long, John G. Fratz, and other electors residing in the first and second congressional districts of the State of Ohio, touching the election of BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH and THOMAS L. YOUNG as members of the House of Representatives to represent said districts in this House, and with the accompanying papers, be printed and referred to a select committee of seven members, with power to sit during the recess or vacation, send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and employ a clerk and stenographer; and the expenses necessarily incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I should be glad if the gentleman would so modify his resolution as to direct the committee to inquire into the working of the supervisors law.

Mr. KEIFER. In the city of Cincinnati?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, in the city of Cincinnati. It seems just to both sides.

Mr. McMAHON. That is one of the chief ends of the resolution already.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not covered by the language of the resolution.

Mr. McMAHON. I decline to modify the resolution any further.

Mr. KEIFER. The object is to investigate the operation of the supervisors law in the city of Cincinnati.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to yield to my colleague from Cincinnati.

Mr. McMAHON. I would inquire of the Speaker how much time I have left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. McMAHON. I will yield, then, to the gentleman for ten minutes, if he so desires.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to be so soon called upon to address this House in any behalf, and I trust I shall be pardoned for saying a single word touching this resolution, since it so immediately concerns the title by which I claim my seat upon this floor.

I am heartily in favor of the adoption of the resolution, for I submit to the House if I have been engaged in any work in Cincinnati for a number of years it has been to "root out" every conceivable form of corruption in the conduct of elections, State and national. And I shall be very glad to join hands with my colleague from Ohio in pushing forward that very commendable work under this resolution. I ask him, however, in fairness to permit the resolution to be modified as suggested by my colleague on the right, so as to include investigation into the practical workings of the supervisors law touching the election in the two Cincinnati districts, because if it shall appear to this House upon investigation that the machinery which you have constructed, so to speak, for the purpose of preserving the purity of elections has been utilized for the purpose of fraud there, I desire, all our people desire, to know it and to punish the instruments who have perverted that law to base and dishonest uses for which it was not intended. And I trust my colleague from Ohio will consent to that modification of his memorial. Although I heard of it but recently and knew nothing about it before leaving my home in Cincinnati, I have been permitted, through my colleague's kindness, to read it since I came here.

It charges that the election of my colleague from the second district and my own election were brought about in a large degree by the dishonest and corrupt use of governmental machinery, that is, by the dishonest and corrupt use of supervisors and deputy marshals appointed in those two districts. I assert the charge is unfounded—without foundation—and because I believe they were instrumental in securing to the people of those two districts the purest, the fairest, and the freest election they have had in that city for twenty-five years, it is due to the people not only of those two districts but to the people of this Union that the practical working of the supervisors law there should be fully and fairly investigated. I commend that investigation to my friends on the other side of this Chamber.

If they believe this law ought to be repealed, if the men who have signed this memorial are respectable, and I submit I know many of them well, I have practiced at the same bar with them, and I have met them day and night, and I have never heard it suggested that there was anything against them, but exactly the contrary; and I am glad to know that we were not able to get a reputable democrat to bear this memorial from Cincinnati to this Chamber, but a political hybrid who is neither a republican nor a democrat, but like the bat, which is between a bird and a beast, neither the one nor the other.

Now I desire to say a word touching the affidavits and the reasons I desire that they shall not be published. My colleague knows very well that although these affidavits may be fraudulent, full of moral perjury, yet none of the men will be liable to prosecution under indictment for having committed perjury. I submit that my colleague should have called them written statements instead of affidavits, because the word affidavit has a legal significance.

All I ask of this House is a free, full, and fair investigation, not only to purify this House from unworthy members, but as a warning to evil-doers, and if there shall be found a taint of fraud affecting the title of my colleague or myself to our seats, all I ask is that we be unseated as unworthy to sit upon this floor.

I want to say again to the House that it is rather exceptional for a republican candidate to be elected from that district. I had the misfortune—no, the good fortune to be elected in spite of the opposition of the democratic party and every dishonorable republican who has been in the habit of huckstering in politics in that district. Through the instrumentality and workings of the supervisors law we walked to victory. We have borne ourselves as fairly and honorably as other members upon this floor have done, and we only ask that if we are to be ousted from our seats that we be treated with that considerate fairness due to members upon this floor.

One of the objections is that we were guilty of "treating." So far as the charge of "treating" is concerned, a plea of guilty might be entered. Of course there was some drinking, but that would hardly shock the sense of propriety of members upon the other side of the Chamber. That seems to be the ground of one of the charges.

Again I say that I heartily favor the passage of the resolution, and I only ask that it shall be modified, and with that modification I am heartily in favor of the appointment of the committee. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Will my colleague [Mr. McMAHON] allow me to offer this modification to the resolution?

And that said committee be authorized and directed to investigate and report to the House the mods and effect of the execution of the law relating to the duty of supervisors and deputy marshals in said elections at Cincinnati.

If my colleague will allow that amendment I think the resolution will be broad and fair.

Mr. McMAHON. I will accept the modification; but I am surprised that gentlemen on the other side should ask its adoption, for if anything is already embodied in the memorial it is a complaint of the workings of the law authorizing deputy marshals at the elections. Many of the specifications are aimed at the corrupt uses to which the law has been put. The conclusion of the memorial is a request to Congress to repeal it for that reason.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not assume any responsibility for the truth of the statements made in the affidavits. Of the charges here made I know nothing. There are some gentlemen who seem unable to appreciate the situation. I will explain to them that, as a Representative from Ohio, I make no charge, on my own responsibility, of fraud in the election in these districts. I do not know whether there is truth or falsity in these statements. I do not know whether any of these men made these statements or not, but I do know the gentlemen who signed this memorial, and I am glad that my colleague from Cincinnati has put himself on record as admitting that they are gentlemen of standing in that city. The fact that the memorial was brought by what my colleague calls a hybrid has nothing to do with the facts. I think that if the gentlemen who signed the paper in Cincinnati had committed it to a convict to bring here it would not invalidate a single statement in any one of the affidavits. It is an ad captandum argument by gentlemen on the other side which is entirely unworthy of this important occasion. It is an important occasion, because, as my colleague admits, intelligent and influential men, known personally to him as such, put themselves on record in this House, charging fraud in the election; and I must say that the gentleman has not properly represented the memorial when he says he is charged with the use of liquor in the election.

I find nothing in this memorial, as it lies before me, about the use of liquors at the election. I am sorry to say that the charge is more grave than that. It charges the more serious offense of purchasing votes and bribing electors. It says nothing about "treating" or the use of liquor. I now call the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the resolution had better be again read, as it has been modified.

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague had better indicate where that clause comes in. It ought to come in just before the clause about the money to pay the expenses.

Mr. McMAHON. I will consent to that, and now ask that the resolution as modified be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the memorial of John Follet, Alexander Long, John G. Fratz, and others, electors residing in the first and second congressional districts of the State of Ohio, touching the election of BENJAMIN BUTTERWORTH and THOMAS L. YOUNG as members of the House of Representatives to represent said districts in this House, be printed and with the accompanying papers be referred to a select committee of seven members, with power to sit during the recess or vacation, to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to employ a clerk and stenographer; and that said committee be authorized and directed to investigate and report to this House the mode and effect of the execution of the law in relation to the duties of supervisors and deputy marshals in said election at Cincinnati; and the expenses necessarily incurred in the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. I trust the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] will yield one moment to my colleague on my right, [Mr. YOUNG,] not to go into a discussion of the subject, and not over a minute.

Mr. McMAHON. I will yield for one minute. I have called the previous question and do not desire to lose my right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The hour to which the gentleman is entitled will not be up until five minutes after one o'clock.

Mr. McMAHON. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I do not know that I can add anything to the statement made by my colleague [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] in relation to this whole proceeding. I do not think that this is either the time or the place to discuss the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio on the right of the Chair, [Mr. McMAHON.]

I rise now only to say that I fully indorse what my colleague [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] has said, and give free consent on my part to an investigation that will take in every point now embraced in the resolution and to say that I do not want to be here unless I have a clear title to the seat.

I desire to say also that before this matter is determined by this House, after this investigation shall have been made, with the permission of the House I shall take occasion to review this proceeding and to give the real animus of this attempt to beslime my colleague and myself for political reasons.

I certainly was more astonished than any other man perhaps could be under the circumstances to hear of this memorial and of the specifications upon which it is said to be based. Frequently since the election I have met my worthy competitor for the office of Representative, Hon. Leonard M. Goss, and he has repeatedly, in the presence of democrats of good standing, acknowledged that he was fairly beaten and that I was entitled to the seat. When urged to contest my election for party purposes he cast the idea aside and said it was simply farcical.

More than that, it will be found when this investigation is over that the whole proceedings, like other investigations of the Forty-fifth Congress, will prove to be entirely farcical.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the resolution as modified.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. McMAHON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will withdraw that motion and let us take some action in regard to the rules of the House.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. ATKINS. I insist upon my motion.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 161, noes 39.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at one o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of John Payne, of Oregon, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the application of Frank Ringnet, for compensation for property destroyed by Indians at Cayuse Station, Oregon, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, it was Ordered, That the memorial of citizens of Knox County, Nebraska, remonstrating against the permanent location of the Santee Sioux Indians in that county and praying for their removal to the old Ponca reservation, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. FERRY, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the case for the relief of Robert Gorthy and Calvin Green be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the refusal by one House of Congress to make necessary provision for the support of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, and for the defense of the country, except upon condition that the other House and the President shall give their assent to legislation which they disapprove, and the refusal by Congress to make such provision except upon condition that the President shall give such assent, are unconstitutional, revolutionary, and if persisted in must lead to the overthrow of constitutional government and the destruction of the national life.

Mr. WALLACE. Let that lie over and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask that the order presented by myself a few days ago in reference to the withdrawal of the papers of the opponents to the extension of the patent of E. N. Horsford may be taken up. It is on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that is not to lead to debate, I make no objection; but otherwise, I wish to ask that the eighth rule may be followed, which requires the Chair to lay before the Senate resolutions offered on a previous day; and there is an earlier one, I believe, than that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be read.

The Secretary read the following order, submitted by Mr. WINDOM on the 19th instant:

Ordered, That the opponents to the extension of the patent of E. N. Horsford have leave to withdraw their papers from the files of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be entered.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senate to excuse me from service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia. I desire to say in reference to this request, that there is no dissatisfaction on my part at the assignments which have been made of me; but I am assigned to seven committees, and, as there are but six working days in the week, I am compelled to make a request to be excused from some committee service; I therefore ask to be excused from service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks to be excused from further service upon the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by me the day before yesterday requesting information from the Treasury Department in regard to the accounts of deputy marshals.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there are no further bills or joint resolutions, the Chair announces the order of "concurrent and other resolutions."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the eighth rule may be followed, which requires the Chair to lay before the Senate in their order the resolutions of a previous day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the resolutions hitherto introduced in their order.

Mr. CONKLING. Meanwhile may I make an inquiry? Why is it that no resolution and no bill which has been offered during this session is to be found on our desks? The Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] the other morning, I believe the first morning, offered a resolution; I see nothing of it; the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUMDS] offered one; I cannot find that; and I observe by inquiry of other Senators, that nobody seems to have the usual printed copies of resolutions——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Or bills either.

Mr. CONKLING. Or bills.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is unable to answer the question.

Mr. CONKLING. We are undergoing so many radical changes now, that for one, when I come to be denied the opportunity of reading measures before the Senate, it seems to add new terror to the revolution we are passing through.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from New York please state to the Senate who has charge of that business and who is responsible for the failure to have these bills and resolutions on our tables?

Mr. CONKLING. That information, like everything else, ought to proceed from the majority of the Chamber. I do not feel at liberty to state anything. It is with great trepidation that I venture even to ask a question.

Mr. COCKRELL. I sympathize very deeply with the Senator from New York in his terror-stricken feelings, but this side of the House is not responsible for the bills and resolutions not being printed and laid upon the table of every Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. Of which side of the House does the Senator speak?

Mr. COCKRELL. The democratic side of the House. The republican party has entire charge and control of that matter and is alone responsible.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the resolutions on the Calendar in their order.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS on the 19th instant:

Whereas the necessity for the present special session of Congress has been occasioned by the failure of the last Congress to make appropriations for the support of the Army and for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year; and

Whereas the business and other public interests of the country will be best promoted by confining legislation at this session to making provision for the objects aforesaid, and by an early adjournment: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That all bills and joint resolutions, excepting those for the aforesaid purposes, shall be referred to appropriate committees and not reported until the next December session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate agree to this resolution?

Mr. WALLACE. That subject is already under consideration, and I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would be a good reason why it should not be laid on the table, if it is under consideration. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. Let the resolution be reported again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again reported.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the resolution lie on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when Mr. BURNSIDE's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. BURNSIDE] has been called out of the city until Monday, and has paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] is not in his seat, being engaged in the Supreme Court.

Mr. GROOME. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] is necessarily detained from the Senate. If here, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Bailey,	Farley,	Kernan,	Thurman,
Bayard,	Garland,	Lamar,	Vance,

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

MARSHALS AT ELECTIONS.

Mr. WALLACE. I call up the resolution which I introduced a few days ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the Calendar in its order.

The Secretary read the next resolution on the Calendar, being one submitted by Mr. WALLACE on the 20th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate a detailed statement of the accounts of the marshals of the United States in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, and Maryland rendered to this date, for and in regard to the employment of and payment of wages or fees charged for services performed by them or their special deputies in relation to the conduct of elections in November, 1878, showing the amount claimed by or paid to each of said special deputies and the aggregate paid or claimed from the United States by the said marshals for services connected with the elections.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that the word "requested" be changed to the word "directed," which is the usual word in all such cases.

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution be read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again reported.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggested that the word "requested" be changed to the word "directed."

Mr. CONKLING. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. COCKRELL. As has been very often suggested by the Senator from New York.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the date mentioned? The accounts of marshals paid from what time?

The SECRETARY. "In relation to the conduct of elections in November, 1878."

Mr. THURMAN. It ought to be "October and November."

Mr. WALLACE. I accept the suggestion, and will modify the resolution by inserting "October and" before "November."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is so modified.

Mr. CONKLING. This resolution, I think, is too narrow in another respect. The Senator specifies certain States. I move in lieu of the five States here specified to include all the States; so that it shall read:

Marshals of the United States in the respective States rendered to this date.

In lieu of the words:

Marshals of the United States in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, and Maryland.

There are a number of other States of which I have information, touching which I think we ought to know. The thirst of the Senator from Pennsylvania for information on this subject I know will prevent his objecting. To be sure and include them all, I think we had better say "the respective States."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator move that amendment?

Mr. CONKLING. I do. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania object?

Mr. WALLACE. I do. The Senator from New York can introduce a separate resolution in reference to the other States. The information sought in the original resolution can be obtained in a much shorter time than it can if it is extended over the whole ground he desires to cover. If the Senator "thirsts for information," as he thinks I do, he surely can get it as well as I can, and he certainly can introduce a separate resolution. Therefore I hope the resolution as originally introduced will be adopted.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, unfortunately the mover of this amendment is not able, and is not likely to be in the near future, to obtain the consent of the Senate to such inquiries as he may choose to make. His utmost opportunity is to avail himself of the occasion when the Senator from Pennsylvania, or some other Senator of influence who can carry his measures, offers a resolution to which an amendment may be appropriate. I am amazed at the suggestion made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I read some time ago in newspapers an account of a proceeding which took place elsewhere; I read of an attempt, in the first place, to direct an inquiry as to frauds to certain localities excluding all others, and of an attempt to enlarge the area of inquiry, and then, according to the account, the objection we now hear was made—made with some show, at least a specious show, of force, because it was said, "This inquiry is to be conducted by a committee, and if you are to send a committee throughout the thirty-eight States you so amplify and prolong the inquiry that it will fail, because it will extend beyond the life-time of the Congress which orders it."

Here is a request, or a direction, as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] has appropriately made it, to an Executive Department of the Government to send here transcripts of certain accounts or records in the Department. In minutes and in hours the Senator from Pennsylvania is right in saying that if you require it as to "the respective States," a longer time will be necessary, but no appreciable longer time. Therefore, the argument of convenience, the objection which was made on the occasion to which I have referred, as far as under the rules of the Senate I have a right to refer to it, loses all force when made here.

I think the Senate should know, I think the country should know, not in respect of a particular State which the Senator may select, but at large, the amounts which have been paid, and I hope some Senator will later suggest also the reasons for paying those amounts to guard from depredations the casting and the count of votes. If it has been excessive or improper in the States which the Senator does not name, we should know it, and for all the reasons applicable to the States which the Senator has seen fit to specify.

But conscious as I am that the Senator is likely to effect his wishes by directing in this respect the votes of his associates, I want before the vote is recorded to have the simple issue between us understood. The Senator from Pennsylvania has selected for some reason five States, and under guise of an inquiry for the truth, he seeks to know as to them. I want to know as to them, and I want to know also as to all the other States. The Senator from Pennsylvania stops me saying that he will not know, he will refuse to know as to the other States; and that although no additional expense is involved in the inquiry, although not one day will be added to the time necessary to furnish the information, and although, I submit, there can be no objection to it except to stifle and cover up so much of the inquiry as will fall within my amendment and as will fall without the original proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

I say, Mr. President, turn on the lights. Turn on the lights not only as to the States which the Senator has mentioned but as to all the States, and let us know the truth, which is not likely to wrong anybody who ought not to be wronged.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I repeat what I said when I was on my feet before, that there is no purpose to deprive the Senate of information in regard to any of the States. If the Senator from New York will introduce a resolution covering all the remaining States there will be found no votes, I think, (certainly not mine,) on this side of the Chamber against his resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. I do introduce it now.

Mr. WALLACE. My purpose is simply that the committee in charge of this subject may be enabled to go forward with its inquiry as speedily as it can, having obtained the information that is indispensable to the progress of its work in a few of the States and obtaining that from the remainder of the States as it is needed. If, on the contrary, we cover the whole of the States in a single inquiry the time needed for the preparation of the report in answer to the resolution must necessarily be much longer than if the resolution applied to a few States; and that is the sole reason why I object to the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator to what committee he alludes?

Mr. WALLACE. The committee constituted by the Senate to inquire into the frauds in the recent elections.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then may I suggest to my honorable friend that that committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, and it can call upon the Secretary of the Treasury for the information that applies to its special work, without the intervention of the Senate. This is a general resolution. The Senate is to get information by it for any purpose that it thinks fit, for legislative or other proceedings. So far as the object of this resolution is directed to the assistance of that particular committee, I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that it is quite unnecessary altogether. The committee has complete power to send for persons and papers; it can command the attendance of the Secretary of the Treasury and all his papers, and all his information, so far as they are concerned; but this is certainly very important information as applied to all the States which all of us would be very glad to see, and the bottom of it.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, the committee that I have referred to has already sat some three months. Its attention was directed to a single section of the country. It obtained all the information that it sought or needed in regard to that section of the country. It concluded its labors and made its report to the Senate.

A different phase of the case is now presented under the resolution, in regard to which the committee made no inquiry. The committee is about to give its attention to that phase of the inquiry, and it seeks the information asked for in this resolution for their guidance. They may do it, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont, very properly, but they undertake to do it by an application for the information from the Senate itself. There is nothing improper in this course, and certainly the Senate should give to this committee the power to procure that which it seeks to give, light to the country.

It seems to me for these reasons that if the committee, acting through one of its members on the floor of the Senate, asks the Senate to pass a resolution to obtain this information for the Senate the country and the committee, there should be no objection to it only because the committee has the power to do the same. The simple purpose is to obtain this information as rapidly as possible. As to the other States, we are content that that information shall be obtained also as rapidly as possible, and the committee would be very glad to have it. Reason and sense teach us that a short inquiry is easier answered than one which covers a wider field.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Pennsylvania speaks and asks for one committee. I venture to ask for another. The Senator from Pennsylvania speaks for a special committee of the Senate. I speak for the committee of the whole, that committee composed of all the people of the country. The special committee of the Senate needs no such resolution, for it has in its hands now not only the power to obtain this information, but the information itself, if it comes to that. The committee of the whole people, (because I think that committee of the whole is looking on now with some interest and some justifiable curiosity,) has not this information nor does it possess at this moment the power to obtain it except through the Senate. Therefore, discouraging in no way, hindering for not one day the purpose of the honorable Senator, I humbly demand that this information shall be full and specific, to the end that all concerned, and not merely the Senator from Pennsylvania, may know the exact truth, and all of it, touching this very interesting subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question, which is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York?

Mr. CONKLING. I think we had better have the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I have not the least objection in the world to the amendment of the honorable Senator from New York, provided it will not practically interfere with the prompt return of the information required by the committee. After the election of 1876, and the gross abuses, as I conceive, committed by the then Attorney-General of the United States under the guise of enforcing the act of 1871 by the appointment of countless deputy marshals who were to take charge on the day of election of the whole process of election, assuming authority paramount to that of the States, so that freedom of election by the States was practically gone and the power to control elections passed entirely into the hands of the Federal agents, I offered a resolution that should include the accounts of all the marshals in all the States, that is to say, the number of marshals who were employed and the pay given to each. I well remember that the resolution was then extended so that still further information should be called for, and finally it came; but it was delayed so long that if the same time is taken now that was taken then, I apprehend this special session will be very much prolonged,—prolonged at least far beyond my individual wishes.

This committee was raised at the last session of Congress, when the control of this body was in the hands of a different party from that which now controls it. But the committee has been continued; its powers have not been extended; its scope has not been enlarged. It simply proposes to continue the same investigation. The proposition practically is made by a Senator representing the committee, knowing the condition of its business, knowing in some degree the extent of the information required, that the accounts in four or five named States shall be sent in to the Senate. That is intended to throw light. Is there objection to it? I apprehend there can be none. But practically what is the effect of the amendment? When you move to include thirty-three other States and to ask the information in regard to them, what is the result? Will not the Senate see it; will not the country comprehend it? The result would be, as I fear, to delay the modicum of information reasonably asked for by the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

I can conceive no fairer answer to the Senator from New York, and I would submit it to his own sense of fairness, than the offer upon the part of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, which most assuredly would have my aid and my vote, that a similar resolution relating to the other thirty-three States be instantly passed upon the adoption of the pending resolution, only so that this information asked by the committee shall not be delayed.

Remember, Mr. President, to whom and to what official this inquiry is directed. Surely the present Secretary of the Treasury, surely the officers of the present Administration, will not be found wanting in furnishing information which is asked from so well-known and distinguished a source as the honorable Senator from New York. There will be no delay as to this further information. Then what is the reason why we may not have the information as to five States when there is everywhere a unanimity in agreeing that any information as to the remaining thirty-three States shall also be asked? "There is reason in all things;" there is a practical common sense in all things. If any gentleman here, knowing the condition of these accounts, will say that there will be no practical delay as to obtaining the information asked for by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania because the official information asked for by the honorable Senator from New York is tacked upon the resolution, I have not the least objection to it.

There cannot be for me and for those with whom I act too bright a light shed upon the whole business of conducting elections in the States under the paramount influence of the Federal Government. It is a question that to-day may be affected by the light of the accidental possession of power, but it is a question that in the future every American must feel to be pregnant with the most serious results to the very Constitution of our form of government.

Therefore it is that in preparing the public mind, in preparing that great body of public opinion that sooner or later must have its way and control the affairs of this country, I do desire that the fullest investigation and the clearest light be shed upon the whole of this subject. Now it becomes simply a practical matter. Senators on the other side of this Chamber, would you refuse to shed the light upon the affairs that concern these five States when you can obtain it by a resolution, and when it is openly agreed that the secondary resolution giving you the same light, to the same full degree, shall be passed at the same time as to thirty-three other States, suggested by the honorable Senator from New York?

I do not mean to say, for I am not fully convinced, that the information in regard to thirty-three States would so postpone the information needed in regard to the five States named that it could not be had at the present session; but as there is some doubt upon that subject, why not take the two resolutions? One preceding the other will give the information asked for by the committee; the other will give the information asked for by the honorable Senator from New York, and equally desired by me, and I believe by all those who sit around me.

As a question of practical effect, therefore, why may we not agree to pass the pending resolution and to pass also a resolution covering the amendment of the honorable Senator from New York? When this matter is to be confided as to its execution to the power of the present Administration, not in accord with the majority of this body, is there any reason why the resolution as to five States should not precede the resolution as to the remaining thirty-three States?

I hope, therefore, the course will be taken by the Senate to pass the two resolutions. They relate to the same subject, but there is no reason why one should not precede the other for all practical purposes. There is no reason why the information should not come as to all, and there is as little reason to doubt that the information will be promptly furnished as to the thirty-three States as that it will be forwarded in regard to the five States specially named in the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the vote one moment; but as I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from New York I propose to state the reason why I shall do so. I agree with him in seeking to obtain all the light possible upon all these subjects; but we have had some experience in regard to this matter. On the 7th day of December, 1876, the Senate of the United States passed a resolution calling upon the Attorney-General for "information in relation to deputy marshals employed at the election of November 7, 1876;" and it was not until the 12th day of February, 1877, over two months after, that the Attorney-General was able or saw fit to send a communication in response to the resolution to the Senate of the United States. There is reason to assume that if the inquiry is made broad now, as is sought by the Senator from New York, sixty days will again intervene, and the Attorney-General will say that he has not had the time nor the opportunity nor the ability to get the information from all the States to make the report called for, and that would effectually destroy the usefulness of the committee referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania for at least sixty days. When that report did come to the Senate, in February, 1877, which I now hold in my hand, after holding it up for sixty days, the Attorney-General had to assure the Senate that from a number of States he had not obtained full reports, and that he could only send in partial reports then.

Hence, not desiring to delay the committee that is now charged with this matter and is now looking into the conduct of the elections in those five States as to which information can be given within a week, I see no reason why we should attach the amendment of the Senator from New York, which would necessarily delay the information for not less than two months. I desire to say, as other Senators have said, that whenever the resolution of the Senator from New York comes up after this is passed, I shall not only vote for it, but I hope there will not be a Senator on this side of the Chamber who will even ask that it lie over one day under the rule, and that the Senate will pass it for him in five minutes; and if objection comes, I think he will find it will not come from the democratic side of the House.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator from Kentucky or the Senator from Delaware mean to imply that the marshals have been so generally used in all the States that it will take a very long time to give this information—all the States having had marshals in them?

Mr. BECK. They seem to have been very largely used in 1876, judging from the report to which I have referred.

Mr. BLAINE. I venture to say that I can name eight or ten States in which not one single marshal was employed; certainly not in my own State, certainly not in Vermont.

Mr. EATON. Then you do not want to hear from them. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator from Kentucky say that they have been used in his State to any great extent?

Mr. BECK. No, not to any great extent.

Mr. BLAINE. At all?

Mr. BECK. A little, I think.

Mr. BLAINE. In Rhode Island not at all; in Michigan not at all; in Minnesota not at all; in Wisconsin not at all; in Kansas not at all; in Nebraska not at all. Now, the honorable Senator from Delaware and the honorable Senator from Kentucky rise and say if we ask this information everywhere it is going to make such a ponderous work for the Department of Justice that they will never get through with it, thus creating the impression by such a remark that the marshals have been used just as generally through all the rural and well-behaved portions of this country as in those large, boisterous centers where rowdyism and corruption have rule, and where they need to be kept in check by some strong power.

Mr. BECK. Have I the floor, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. It is fair that not only we should have the information of what the marshals have done, but information from those sections of the country in which there never were found any ten men who would sign a certificate that marshals were needed to insure a fair election. I want to hear from those sections. I represent one of them myself.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I do not intend to be provoked into any debate. It is perfectly obvious that we shall receive the information in regard to the five States named in the original resolution in a much shorter time than we can obtain it as to all the other States. The only object I have in view is to obtain a report from the Secretary of the Treasury at the earliest possible moment. Whether the purpose of the amendment is (I do not suppose it is, it is avowed not to be) to delay the information, the effect will be that it will so far delay the report as to the States from which we need to hear that it will practically amount to a denial of information altogether. The two resolutions can be passed one after the other. The Senator from New York can pass his amendment as a separate resolution in five minutes unless some Senator on his own side of the Chamber objects. I therefore think that the amendment ought to be voted down and that the information ought to be had as to those five States at once, and not run the risk of delay; and we know it will be the excuse made for delay if we include all the States in one resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has made a very cogent argument, to which but one criticism can be made, and that is that it has no foundation on which to stand. I say this with great respect to the Senator from Kentucky, and I think I can convince him of it. He has reminded us that on the 12th of December, 1876, after a general election, a presidential election, had been held, a resolution was addressed to the Department of Justice requiring a great variety of information, which he says, and says correctly, the Attorney-General answered that even up to that date he had been unable to gather and transmit; and upon that occurrence he founds an argument that delay will occur in the response to this resolution if amended as I propose.

If I can have the attention of the Senator from Kentucky for one moment I will try to show him now why I say, with great respect to him, that his argument applied here has no foundation. For what does this resolution call? The accounts in the Treasury Department rendered to this day. Does the Senator mean now in the presence of those words to liken this to the proceeding of the Senate when we told the Attorney-General to go in quest of all manner of detailed information, and as he gathered it in to send it to the Senate? Here is a proposal to call for a transcript of accounts in the Treasury Department, which I undertake to say will not require two days, either in the form which will be given by my amendment or as the resolution will stand without it. Yet Senators rise, and gravely, and as I am bound to suppose sincerely, profess to oppose this amendment for fear of the delay which is likely to occur. If I might borrow from the honorable Senator from Ohio, the senior Senator, I would venture to say "that won't do." That won't do. All this information can be sent here in eight and forty hours. It is incredible that so much of the accounts audited, perfected, transcribed in the Treasury Department as indicate that so much money has been paid for a specific purpose in one State, and so much in another, cannot be furnished as to as many States as the resolution will embrace.

Some Senators said deputy marshals had not been appointed in various States, upon which my erudite friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] remarked "then you do not want to hear from them." No, nor would you under this resolution hear from them. Why? Because that would not be a case in which an account has been rendered up to date; and so the resolution would apply to the States and only to the States in respect of which accounts have been rendered. That is the answer to it.

Now, Mr. President, I think it will hardly do to shuffle off the call for this information, first by saying that a resolution which has no reference on earth to a special committee but an abstract resolution directing the Treasury Department to furnish information to the Senate does appertain to a particular committee and is for its benefit alone, and second, to say that the call being upon an Executive Department for accounts which are there patent to-day it will take such a long time to include the eight or ten additional States to which moneys have been paid that it will not do to hazard this great inquiry for fear of the procrastination which may possibly ensue.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask my friend from New York if he is willing to say that if the amendment he offers is adopted the information will be given in forty-eight hours after the resolution is passed.

Mr. CONKLING. If I had the influence which my honorable friend from Indiana is known to possess, and the whole of which he possesses except so far as it is divided with his associates, I should not hesitate at all to say that the officer to whom this resolution is to be addressed shall comply with it with all manner of diligence. It seems rather a mockery for the honorable Senator to propose that question to me. If he will tell me what he thinks should be done and what advice he will give, then I shall form a tolerably definite opinion as to what is likely to occur.

Mr. McDONALD. As the Senator from New York offered this amendment, I simply desired to know if he felt quite sure it would be answered in forty-eight hours; and when he said it would be, whether that is to be regarded as authority, because if it can be answered in that time, or twice that time, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. There is a great distinction, as the Senator will observe, between the statement that such a thing can be done and done conveniently within eight and forty hours and the statement that it will be done or that a person making the statement has any authority in regard to it. I said, and I say again, and I say it without the slightest hesitation or doubt, that these accounts in the Treasury Department can be copied in eight and forty hours. Does the Senator from Indiana doubt that?

Mr. McDONALD. I doubt very much whether it will be done in that time.

Mr. CONKLING. I am not talking about what will be. I ask the Senator from Indiana whether he doubts that these accounts may be conveniently copied in eight and forty hours?

Mr. McDONALD. I am not prepared to say whether they will be copied in that time or not.

Mr. EATON. I doubt it.

Mr. CONKLING. Another Senator has been found who doubts it, and the most convenient adjunct of the Senator from Indiana. His doubting power was not adequate to the occasion, but my honorable friend from Connecticut, coming to the rescue, says he is willing to doubt it. All I can say is that I am not willing to doubt it, because it is inconceivable that a half dozen clerks cannot make in respect of fifteen or twenty States a copy of the accounts of the moneys paid in those States to deputy marshals. I submit that that is a draft upon credulity which no man is bound to honor, even though my honorable friend from Pennsylvania says he has some doubt on the subject.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, only a word. My friend from New York says that he desires light, the broadest light. He shall have it, and have it by my vote, but not now; and I will give my reasons. The resolution provides—

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate—

What?

a detailed statement of the accounts of the marshals of the United States in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, and Maryland, rendered to this date, for and in regard to the employment of and payment of wages or fees charged for services performed by them, or their special deputies, in relation to the conduct of elections in October and November, 1878, showing the amount claimed by or paid to each of said special deputies, and the aggregate paid or claimed from the United States by the said marshals for services connected with the said elections.

I undertake to say, with all due deference to my friend from New York and to his opinion, that this information with regard to these five States neither can nor will be furnished in forty-eight hours, by any half-dozen clerks in the employment of the Secretary of the Treasury. It will take a longer time to do the work than forty-eight hours. If we get the information in four times forty-eight hours it will be as early as I shall expect to receive it.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. EATON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator think that it will take a longer time or a shorter time to furnish the information as to these five States than as to all the residue of the States? In other words, if he is right in saying that the clerks set to work on these accounts will require four times forty-eight hours to do their work, does he think that that time will suffice to cover the residue of the States also, or not?

Mr. EATON. That question is very easily answered. If it should take ten, or fifteen, or twenty clerks forty-eight hours, or four times forty-eight hours, to furnish the information necessary under this resolution, to furnish the information necessary under the additional resolution or amendment of my friend from New York would require forty other clerks; and therefore the entire force of the Department not absolutely engaged must be brought to bear upon this one subject.

I agree that if you will take the entire force in the Department from other business and put them upon this work, giving to one man one State or a part of a State and to another man one State or a part of a State, the information with regard to the thirty-eight States in the Union can be furnished just as quickly, just as readily, as it can in regard to one State. I have no doubt about that; but that is not the course, and it will not be done by this or any other Department. If they would take one hundred or two hundred clerks I agree that it could all be done in forty-eight hours, but that will not be done. Here is a committee of the Senate, authorized by the Senate to perform a certain duty. That duty applies to certain States and they ask for information from those States. Therefore, I say let us give that committee the information they desire, and if my friend from New York will draft a resolution requiring information from the other States, I will support it as readily as I support the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. McMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. WINDOM] has been called from the Senate, and is paired on this question with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea." The Senator from West Virginia, I presume, would vote "nay."

Mr. HEREFORD. My colleague [Mr. DAVIS] would vote "nay."

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ANTHONY, (when the name of Mr. BURNSIDE was called.) My colleague [Mr. BURNSIDE] is paired on this question with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GROOME, (when the name of Mr. WHYTE was called.) I beg to announce that if my colleague [Mr. WHYTE] were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 37; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. I offer an amendment now to come in at the end of the present resolution, and to be itself a separate resolution; and as it is in my handwriting, I will read it:

Resolved further, That the same information called for in the preceding resolution be likewise sent to the Senate in respect of each of the States not named in said resolution, as soon as the same can be transmitted without deferring an answer to the preceding resolution.

Mr. WALLACE. I accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I venture with great diffidence to offer an additional amendment, which, I trust, will meet the approval of the Senator from Pennsylvania; it is in these words:

And resolved further, That he report fully all information in his possession touching the occasion and necessity of such expenditures and the operation of the laws under which they were made.

Let us see if there is anybody who will object to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. WALLACE. The resolution is directed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who has not charge of the marshals. It is not for him under the law to judge of the necessity for appointing them. It seems to me that the amendment is entirely out of place and it ought not to be adopted. The inquiry ought to go to the Attorney-General.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am afraid my friend from Pennsylvania did not listen to the reading of the amendment. It does not call for any information from the Secretary of the Treasury; it calls merely for whatever information is in his possession. Is it possible, because he is Secretary of the Treasury, that if he has any papers or information, he cannot send them?

Mr. WALLACE. That involves newspaper information or loose rumors that may be in the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject-matter to which this resolution relates. I imagine the Senate will not ask the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury or get such information from him on a subject of this character in that form.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to repeat, so that everybody will understand it, that there is not a line or a syllable or an implication in the amendment I have offered calling for anybody's opinion or anybody's outside information; but if these accounts and vouchers in the Treasury are what they ought to be, the papers will show upon whose application and in what exigency the appointments were made for which this money was expended and whether the number of marshals appointed was too great or too small. It does not call for anybody's opinion or anybody's guess; but whatever information in connection with these accounts and vouchers exists there, as the foundation for them, I need; if the Senator does not want it, he can vote against it.

Mr. KERNAN. It seems to me that this committee ought to be allowed to get the facts which they need without this attempt to embarrass them. I am opposed to the idea of calling on Secretaries to send here information in their possession. When the investigation is made let them be called and sworn, and we shall have facts and not what somebody else said.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It seems to me that the other side should not object to giving information on this subject. They have had control of this body until a very recent date; there has been no attempt on the part of Senators on their side of the Chamber to elicit the information which is now sought either by the original resolution or by the amendments which are proposed, apparently for the purpose of embarrassing the passage of the resolution. I should be very glad to see our brethren on the other side take their present situation a little more cheerfully. I could congratulate them, from the experience of a number of years in the minority, on the fact that it is a much pleasanter position than I apprehend they found as members of the majority. They can aid in giving proper information at the proper time and in a proper way; but on this side of the House when we strike a line on our own action it is a duty to ourselves not to permit the other side of the House to shape our course of policy in reference to any particular measure. It had better be understood at once that the democratic party in possession have responsibilities now upon them, and intend to pursue their own line of policy, uncontrolled and uninfluenced by what may be the wishes of the other side in reference to questions especially of a political character. I hope our friends on the other side will reconcile themselves to their present position, and like Christian statesmen bear it manfully. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I had always labored under the impression that even where there were two parties in the Senate, members of both parties were still Senators, and until this moment I had supposed—I am informed otherwise now—that Senators in a minority even, had an opportunity and a right to offer amendments to pending measures. I had not supposed before (because such was never the practice to my knowledge) that a minority was to be assailed for proposing to improve legislation at all, unless we correct the yea and nay list and must vote one way or the other. I do not know but that some conclave of the democracy somewhere—because it is said there are frequent conclaves of that kind now—will bring in a resolution to correct the yea and nay list and strike off all the republican names. It would leave the responsibility still with the democratic party where it belongs, they say.

Mr. President, that sort of thing I am sorry to hear in this Chamber. I believe when the Senator from Delaware was in the minority—and I expect to live to see the day when he will again assume that graceful position [laughter]—that he was constant in season and out of season in proposing improvements, as they appeared to him, to measures that were proposed by gentlemen who did not happen to agree with him about the universal state of the Union, and they were frequently adopted, I am glad to say, because it had not occurred to any Senator that I know of of a different political opinion, that it was not equally his right and his duty when measures were proposed in this body to move to amend them. Until the present time I had supposed there was an equal right, if anybody should propose a proposition germane and fit, that even a Senator in the majority might vote for it, and that the propriety of agreeing to it depended upon its merits and not upon the particular Senator that had the honor to offer it.

I cannot say that I am glad to know that the rule has been so recently changed, and that the minority in this body may be dismissed from all responsibility or the right to vote upon or express an opinion upon anything that the responsible majority have determined to do. I am sorry to hear that. I am afraid that the people, if there be any, who are still interested in this Congress will be sorry also; but it will be corrected by and by.

Now, Mr. President, all that I have to say in addition is that if this resolution is proposed in serious earnest to get from the Secretary of the Treasury the information that he is supposed to possess regarding these accounts and the papers upon which they are founded, then the Senate ought to agree to the amendment which I have offered, because that is all that is called for, neither newspaper reports nor outside sayings, but it is the ordinary statement of information in the possession of an official of the Government, which bears upon the question of these accounts. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEREFORD, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, was called.) My colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is absent, paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] If he were here, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. MCMILLAN, (when Mr. WINDOM's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. WINDOM] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] He would vote "yea," if present.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 36; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Allison,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Paddock,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Kellogg	Plumb,
Bruce,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	Logan,	Saunders,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	McMillan,	Teller.
Chandler,	Hoar,	Morrill,

ABSENT—10.

Booth,	Davis of Illinois,	Randolph,	Windom.
Burnside,	Davis of W. Va.,	Sharon,
Carpenter,	Groome,	Whyte,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In order to guard against any prejudice that may have arisen or fear of delay, I will now offer the following amendment, which is the same I offered before, with this change, so that it now reads in this way:

Resolved, That as soon as may be, after the information required by the foregoing resolution shall be furnished, he report fully all information in his possession, &c.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And resolved further, That, as soon as may be, after the information required by the foregoing resolution shall be furnished, he report fully all information in his possession touching the occasion and necessity of such expenditures, and the operation of the laws under which they were made.

Mr. BECK. Is it in order to offer an amendment to that amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. BECK. I wanted to offer an amendment to give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to go before the Teller committee and tell them all about it.

Mr. CONKLING. What committee?

Mr. BECK. The Wallace committee. I beg pardon. Let him go before that committee and give them any information he may have.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Vermont if the amendment now provides that, without delaying at all a response to the foregoing resolution, but after having answered it, then the Secretary shall furnish this information as far as he possesses it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is it exactly.

Mr. EATON. His opinion.

Mr. CONKLING. I hear the Senator say in his seat something on which I hope he will not stand in his vote. There is no opinion about it.

Mr. EATON. It does not mean anything else.

Mr. CONKLING. But simply the information, the official information upon which this money was paid, is to be sent here, and a majority of this Chamber, if the other vote indicates what it will do, is about to vote that he shall cut out the items and the totals and withhold the reasons, the explanations, the exigencies, the necessities on which he acted. Let them vote that way if they want to.

Mr. EATON. My friend from New York will permit us to exercise our own judgment with regard to voting. We shall vote, doubtless, as we think advisable. The word "official" is not there, and I assert again that it is the mere information that comes from one source and another to this Department that is sought to be brought before the Senate, and I shall vote against it.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from New York would not only, if he had power, permit the Senators on the other side to vote on their judgment, but he would rejoice to know they were going to vote even on that judgment.

Mr. EATON. We are.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Allison,	Conkling,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,
Blaine,	Edmunds,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Bruce,	Ferry,	Logan,	Saunders,

Burnside,	Davis of W. Va.,	Sharon,

So the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs, will the Senate agree to the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania as amended?

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

SMITHSONIAN REGENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair makes the following appointment:

Under the provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the Chair appoints NEWTON BOOTH, a Senator of the United States from the State of California, a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution to fill the vacancy in said board occasioned by the expiration of the term of service of A. A. Sargent, late a Senator of the United States from the State of California.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fourteen minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 21, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I rise to a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF ELECTIONS.

Mr. ELLIS. I rise to a question of privilege, one affecting the rules. I send to the Clerk's desk a resolution which I ask may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the number of the Committee of Elections be increased from eleven to nineteen members.

Mr. ELLIS. I desire the House to adopt this resolution for reasons which I will state. I have served upon the Committee of Elections for the last two years. With a committee consisting of only eleven members, it is impossible that there can be more than three subcommittees at one time. The consequence is that the determination of cases of contest is delayed, and very frequently such cases are never decided at all, while others are not decided until the closing hours of the Congress. Hence very often constituencies are misrepresented—are represented for the larger part of the whole Congress by persons who were never rightfully elected as members. These persons sometimes draw pay for the whole two years, while the members rightfully elected, when admitted in the closing hours of the Congress, draw their pay of course for the same term.

As a measure, then, in the interest of correct representation and as a measure also of economy, I think the resolution should be adopted. It proposes to increase the number of members on the Committee of Elections from eleven to nineteen. Thus there could be six subcommittees sitting at the same time, so that reports could be made much more speedily than they have been. These cases of contest are constantly growing both in number and importance. The records are very voluminous. There are always long printed as well as long oral arguments in these cases. As the committee has been constituted heretofore, it is a matter of impossibility for a Representative to perform properly the ordinary duties devolving upon him as such and at the same time attend faithfully to his duties as a member of this committee.

I have consulted in reference to this subject with a number of leading gentlemen of the House—among them the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] who for the last four years has been chairman of the Committee of Elections; and these gentlemen concur in the justice and wisdom of this measure. If no gentleman wishes to say anything upon this subject I will ask the previous question.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to suggest the propriety of having two committees upon the subject of elections. If there be one committee of nineteen members it will be too large a body to transact business properly. I am satisfied that there is a necessity for increasing the force that must investigate contested elections in this House. Those who have been members here for a number of years know that repeatedly the decision of contested elections has been kept back until the expiring hours of a Congress. I once saw two members from the State of Louisiana seated here by the very last vote that was cast in the Congress.

It is frequently the case in the State Legislatures (I know it is so in the Legislature of my own State) that two committees are appointed to take charge of the same class of business where there is much business of that character. I know that in the Legislature of Texas we have two judiciary committees—No. 1 and No. 2. I suggest to my friend from Louisiana to modify his resolution so as to require the creation of a second Committee of Elections to be called "Committee of Elections No. 2."

Mr. ELLIS. I fail to see how two committees could more speedily decide these cases than one. In truth, I think that one organized body can transact business much more rapidly than two. I fail to see the force of the suggestion of my friend from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. TUCKER. How would the duties of the two committees be distributed?

Mr. ELLIS. As suggested by my friend from Virginia, I would ask how the duties would be distributed between the two committees?

Mr. MILLS. Let each case be specially referred to its particular committee, either committee No. 1 or committee No. 2, as the House might decide.

Mr. CONGER. Is this debate going on by unanimous consent? I think that the resolution had better lie over.

Mr. FRYE. I did not understand that the request of the gentleman was to have the proposition acted upon now.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRYE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I desire to enter a motion that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules. There are several propositions now pending in relation to changes and amendments of the rules. In my view the rules should not be changed hastily or without due and careful consideration. It seems to me a great deal safer to refer propositions of this kind to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ELLIS. I have no desire to press the adoption of the resolution at this time. I think the suggestion of my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is a good one. I only desired to call the attention of the House to this matter. I assent to the motion for a reference of the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Before the resolution is referred, I desire to say a word. I indorse all that the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ELLIS,] lately my colleague on the Committee of Elections, has said. I desire the House and the Committee on Rules to know that it is a mental and physical impossibility for any Committee of Elections organized as heretofore to consider and report properly upon all the various contests in time for prompt action by the House. In one case alone during the last Congress there were more than thirteen hundred pages of closely printed matter. In the various cases coming before the committee, there is enough printed matter to occupy the whole time of a member in examining and studying it. In order to expedite the decision of these contested-election cases, and to save money to the country, the committee should be so enlarged that a number of cases can be investigated by subcommittees at the same time. I hope, therefore, that the Committee on Rules will report favorably the resolution offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. MILLS. There is this difficulty about the proposition of my friend from Louisiana, that every single, solitary contested election case has to go to that committee, and all the nineteen will have to read all the testimony and hear all the arguments. Now, nineteen persons cannot attend to that business any more rapidly than eleven can, whereas if you have two committees, and the business is sent from that desk either to committee No. 1 or committee No. 2, the two committees could be attending to two different cases at the same time.

My own opinion, Mr. Speaker, is that every contested-election case coming before this House ought to be referred at once to a select committee, and each case to a different one. It is a right the people have to send a Representative here and to have his case brought before the House, and to put him into his seat at the earliest possible moment. We have seen for years, however, one-half of the contested-election cases pushed over to the end of the session or to the very end of the term of the Congress itself, and often cases are not decided until the last expiring moments. Not only is the man deprived of the right belonging to him here as a Representative, but his constituency are deprived of the much greater and more important right of representation upon this floor.

Now, I think these objections could be obviated by having two committees—one No. 1 and another No. 2—and have all election cases referred either to No. 1 or No. 2, as the Speaker might think proper. But, as I have already suggested, in my opinion the better plan would be to have each case coming before this Congress referred to a select committee, to be reported back in a few weeks and acted upon promptly.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say a word, if the gentleman from Louisiana will yield to me for a moment for that purpose.

Mr. ELLIS. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I am not entirely sure that it would not be as well to dispense with the Committee of Elections entirely and to refer every election case to the House itself. I said the other day (and I wish to apologize for it now) that I did not believe there was total depravity on the other side, and on a standing vote I found I was right, as there was one gentleman on that side who voted for my proposition; but when it came to the call of the yeas and nays he backed out, and I now want to take back the statement I made. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELLIS. The gentleman discovered something on this side which I failed to discover on that. [Laughter.]

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. BUCKNER. Before the House passes from that question, let me say that during the last Congress there were several instances where democrats had the independence to vote against the report of their committee, while Mr. Cox, of Ohio, was the only instance on the other side of a member voting against the views of his party friends.

Mr. FRYE. That is because we were always right. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. I ask by unanimous consent to introduce the bills which I send to the Clerk's desk, for reference to the appropriate committees, when appointed.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

SPREAD OF EPIDEMIC DISEASES.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I ask to introduce the following resolution for action at the present time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of nine members be appointed by the Speaker of the House, who shall, in connection with a similar committee already appointed by resolution of the Senate, investigate and report the best method of preventing the introduction and spread of epidemic diseases, especially of yellow fever and cholera, within the limits of the United States; and that said committee be allowed a clerk, and be vested with all the powers which were heretofore possessed by the same committee in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman from Michigan will allow the resolution to come in for reference to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. KNOTT. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to call up the amendment to the rules of the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 130, noes 42.

Mr. SPRINGER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned till Tuesday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BELTZHOOVER: The petition of laborers in the Post-Office Department, for an increase of pay—to the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed.

By Mr. DEUSTER: The petition of John Black and others, citizens of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for the repeal of section 7 of the revenue law, relating to wine, distilled and fermented liquors—to the same committee, when appointed.

By Mr. HILL: The petition of James Myers and others, of Putnam County, Ohio, for the passage of the Reagan interstate commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

By Mr. STEELE: The petition of Elliott & Remley, of Charlotte, North Carolina, for the repeal of section 7 of the revenue law, relating to wine, distilled and fermented liquors—to the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed.

By Mr. WHITEAKER: The petition of Samuel Abbott and others, for an increase of the pensions of soldiers of the war of 1812—to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, when appointed.

Also, resolutions of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oregon, favoring the erection of a separate United States custom-house building and bonded warehouse at that port—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, when appointed.

By Mr. WILLITS: Resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, relating to the deepening of Saint Mary's River—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

Mr. WALLACE. I present the memorial of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, of Washington, District of Columbia, in relation to certain laws governing the taking of the national census. I ask that it be read, and referred to the select committee on that subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be reported.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Select Committee to make provision for taking the Tenth Census, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, a citizen of the United States, presents his humble prayer to the two Houses of Congress, not asking any personal favor or individual right or benefit, but simply from a sense of duty to the country, to represent in plain words and a frank spirit the extraordinary nature of some recent legislation touching the national census, in entire confidence that inspection will confirm the representations of what, in his opinion, has been the result of hasty legislation, which, if not remedied, will not only establish a pernicious legislative precedent, but involve an extraordinary and useless waste of money and inflict reproach upon American appreciation of statistical science. It will be my aim to state frankly a few of the numerous defects of the law passed in the last hours of the Forty-fifth Congress, and to express my readiness, on being requested thereto, to appear before any committee to which this memorial may be referred and prove from the law itself the truth of my representations. It is perhaps of no material bearing upon the administration of the law just passed that it specifies the omission of certain subjects of inquiry as embraced by the law which were never included, while it enumerates certain objects of inquiry to be legislated into existence which were already in the law and have place in the three last censuses, and the importance of these variations was urged in both Houses as among the most essential demands of advanced statistical sciences.

Your petitioner represents, first, the law specifies two distinct and different days for the enumeration to commence and to which the census shall apply. Should all or any portion of the enumerators adopt the second period specified, one of the greatest objects of a periodical census will be defeated by a variation of the decadal year.

Second. The remuneration for specific services which appears to be carefully guarded by one section is entirely counteracted by subsequent provisions which grant a discretion in the disbursement of millions of treasure such as has never been conceded even in a time of war.

Third. There is one defect in the bill which alone, had its nature been appreciated, would, in my opinion, have justified the President in withholding his approval. I refer to the failure to provide for a single copy of the original returns. Heretofore, and very wisely, there have always been two copies, one of which was filed at each county seat and one with each secretary of state, so that in event of loss of original the deficiency could be easily remedied. As the law now stands, if the originals be destroyed by fire or lost in transitu there will be no possibility of effecting State or national apportionments until after a meeting of Congress and the enactment (and execution) of a law to provide for a new census. But this is not the worst, there being but one original list of numbers on tens of thousands of separate sheets nothing will be more easy than the abstraction or destruction of a few sheets here and there to affect the State and national apportionments without the possibility of detection or discovery, and all know there is no greater incentive to such crimes at a time of political excitement than the impunity wherewith they may be perpetrated. In two censuses, under the law of 1850, returns of States were lost. But it is quite proper that each State should possess a copy not only to verify pronounced results but for State uses of what the people pay for, and that views of gain from the control of all the social and economical facts relating to fifty million people should not be encouraged by a yielding to interested representations.

Fourth. While there appears to be a limit of time within which the enumerators shall make return of the interests provided for, the restriction is made applicable only to population, and none to other equally important interests; and while provision is made for terminating the existence of the Census Office "upon the completion of its duties," there is nothing to preclude the protraction of those duties to an indefinite period, and the contention which is sure to ensue as to the compensation, when undetermined by law, may be encouraged to preserve the already appropriated fund for the payment of salaries.

Fifth. According to the terms of the law it will be absolutely impossible for any enumerator to appreciate what will be the nature of his duties or the remuneration he may expect, as the form of his oath obliges him to collect "all the statistical facts within his subdivision," while there are conflicting provisions in the law which may and will deprive him of all but some single service, the remuneration wherefor will not be adequate, and which will lead to dissatisfaction, resulting in negligence of duty or its reckless performance. While the sum of $3,000,000 judiciously expended might prove sufficient for a census taken under the guards of the law of 1850, (although that of 1870 cost about three and a half millions,) the limit of $3,000,000, whereto the coming census with its confessedly vaster scope is restricted, must result in depriving the laborer of his earnings in the service of the Government, or lead to disgraceful failure in the prosecution of the census as provided by law, and the authority of one individual of limited experience for this amount will be but small consideration for the endless and just claims of the army of census-takers which will for years demand the consideration of Congress. Such are some of the inconsistencies and faults of the law to which the attention of Congress is asked, in the hope that their mention by one not inexperienced in the subject will induce a timely consideration of what is essential to a good census, and to what is due to the people of the United States who are to bear the charge. In the opinion of your petitioner the proposition to take a census of the Indians of the United States through a bureau officer armed only with portfolio and paper is most preposterous, implying as of easy practicability which all know to be impossible except as to peaceful and subjected tribes, the numbers whereof are already known; while the provision to pay one-half the expenses of intermediate State censuses would effect at the cost of the whole people that which very properly has ever been done at the charge of the States making such enumerations, and which is no more justly a charge upon other States than the cost of their State elections. The unprecedented grant of patronage to a bureau officer, who may determine the compensation of twenty thousand subordinates "without regard to locality," which, although its improper exercise may not be supposed possible under the present Administration, may nevertheless at some future period be converted into an engine of fearful political import. The grant of authority by the bill to any subsequent administrator of the census at his discretion to omit the enumeration of anything heretofore included, is an unprecedented license of most dangerous tendency, and would prove especially injurious, as I am prepared to show, if executed as to omission of interests which were in contemplation when so deleterious a provision was inserted in the bill.

Your petitioner claims his ability to prove beyond doubt the untruthfulness of the representations which have induced certain changes in the law, as he is to demonstrate that they who recommended their propriety could not have understood the real importance of what was excluded, nor the injurious consequence of the omissions.

JOSEPH C. G. KENNEDY.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 148) granting an increase of pension to J. Jackson Purman; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 149) for the relief of John Gotshall; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SAUNDERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 150) to provide for punishing persons who steal horses, mules, and other property from the Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANTHONY. As every Senator has his bill, I shall not be singular, but will bring to the attention of the Senate a bill which has already been under its consideration, and which I think has peculiar appropriateness for this day.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 153) for the benefit of the legal representatives of Asbury Dickins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senate at its last session passed a bill granting a pension to John Smith. It was not reached in the House; and I again submit it to the Senate for the purpose of referring it to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 157) in relation to certain fees allowed registers and receivers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 160) for the relief of H. A. Myers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the adjustment of the accounts of certain land-grant railroads in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, and to obviate the necessity of further litigation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GROVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 162) to ascertain and report the losses of citizens of the State of Oregon and the Territories of Idaho and Montana on account of the destruction of property by hostile Indians in the year 1878; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Pauline Jones, widow of Alexander Jones, now on the files of the Senate, be withdrawn therefrom and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, it was Ordered, That Edward H. Leib have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files.

On motion of Mr. McMILLAN, it was Ordered, That all papers relating to the claim of George M. Brott on the files of the Senate be taken therefrom and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WITHERS. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That the papers in the following cases be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims:
R. A. Young & Brother;
Chieves, surviving partner, &c.;
Pickerell & Brooks; and
W. P. Burwell.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand that the Chair grants all these orders subject to the rule that no papers can be withdrawn where there is an adverse report?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair always grants the order on the condition imposed by the rule.

Mr. WITHERS. No report was made in these cases.

Mr. COCKRELL. These are merely orders of reference from the files of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I know, but the rules of the Senate provide that papers shall not be withdrawn in claims cases where there is an adverse report.

Mr. WITHERS. There has been no report made at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. These papers are merely withdrawn and referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not doubt it. I merely inquired to know if the rules of the Senate were being violated, if that is of any consequence nowadays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be granted on the condition imposed by the rule.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following order:

Ordered, That the petitions and papers in the following cases be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to appropriate committees, namely:
Milton W. Triplett—to the Committee on Claims.
Isaac F. Moore—to the Committee on Claims.
Henry B. Helm—to the Committee on Claims.
Walbridge, Holland & Brown—to the Committee on Claims.
Samuel Castleman—to the Committee on Claims.
James G. Howard—to the Committee on Military Affairs.
Wickliffe Cooper—to the Committee on Military Affairs.
William English—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered on the condition imposed by the rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. I rise to a parliamentary question, as to whether under the rules, when these papers are taken from the files of the Secretary and transferred to the files of a committee of the Senate, copies of the papers are to be left in the Secretary's office? I do not understand that there is any rule requiring copies of papers to be left in such cases.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course not. The point I was calling attention to was the standing rule of the Senate, that where a claim is reported adversely—there may be some other qualification but that is enough for my point now—the papers shall not be taken from the files and referred to a committee to be tried over again, unless there is new evidence. That is the point I was calling attention to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unless there is new evidence, and a memorial setting forth the fact, it cannot be done.

On motion of Mr. MAXEY, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of William Longnecker, of Texas, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers relating to the sale of Fort Hartsuff reservation be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Ordered, That the papers relating to promotion to the office of the Chief of Engineers be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Ordered, That the papers relating to an appropriation for additional posts on the Rio Grande frontier be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Ordered, That the papers relating to an appropriation for the enlargement and protection of the San Antonio arsenal be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There was no adverse report in these cases, the Chair understands.

Mr. MAXEY. There were favorable reports in every case except one, where no report at all was made.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and accompanying papers in the case of the Catholic church of St. Peter and St. Paul, at Chattanooga, Tennessee, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, it was Ordered, That Prudence Pierce and Vanness Pierce have leave to withdraw their papers from the files of the Senate.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask a similar order in three cases in which there have been no reports made at all, namely:

Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Monroe Donoho, of Alabama, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Charles P. Redmond, of Kansas, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers in the case of Drury Bynum, of Mississippi, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The orders were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAMLIN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of John Smith be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Florida, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Mrs. Ellen Call Long be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Walter Tate be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT ON TRANSIT OF VENUS.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the report of the observations of the transit of Venus under the direction of the Navy Department in December, 1874, be printed, and that 3,500 additional copies be printed, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for the use of the Navy Department: Provided, That all illustrations for the said volume shall be paid for from the appropriation already made for that purpose, so far as the same may be available.

ELECTION SUPERVISORS' EXPENSES.

Mr. McDONALD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be required to furnish to the Senate of the United States a statement of the amounts of moneys that have been drawn from the Treasury of the United States and paid to supervisors of elections, general and special, for the years 1876 and 1878, as compensation in excess of fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit court commissioners, and to state separately the amount of such compensation paid to supervisors of elections, general and special, in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati for the years aforesaid.

TRANSACTIONS OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call up the resolution which I offered on the second day of the session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware calls up a resolution, which will be reported.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SAULSBURY on the 19th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the amount of commissions or other compensation paid to bankers, brokers, firms, companies, syndicates, and individuals for services in negotiating the sale of bonds and other obligations of the United States from the year 1862 until the present time; when and to whom such commissions or compensation was paid; and when paid to syndicates, firms, corporations, or companies to state the names of the persons composing the same. And also to inform the Senate whether any, and, if any, what amount of commissions or other compensation has been paid to bankers, brokers, firms, companies, syndicates, and individuals for services rendered in refunding any of the bonds of the United States; and if any such payments have been made to state when and to whom made; and also whether interest has been paid on called bonds at the same time that interest was accruing on the bonds sold to redeem the same, and whether such double interest has been uniformly paid while the refunding operation has been in progress, or on bonds sold for resumption purposes, specifying whether there has been any exception to such payments of double interest, and who was Secretary of the Treasury at the time of such exception, and how much double interest has been paid on each class of bonds and the total amount thereof; and whether the money received for bonds sold by any bank or syndicate has in all cases been allowed to remain on deposit with the national banks acting as Government depositories pending this call of bonds, specifying the names of the banks and the length of time during which the proceeds of the bonds sold have been left on deposit with each bank; and whether at any time any gold coin has been delivered by the Treasury to any parties concerned in the negotiation of United States bonds or otherwise in exchange for or upon the security of United States bonds, or in advance of the payment thereof, pending any call of bonds on which interest was allowed or paid up to the date of the maturity of the call; and also whether any money in the Treasury held for the payment of overdue called bonds has been left on deposit without interest in any Government depository, and what was the largest amount thereof at any one time, stating the names of the banks in which such money was deposited, and what security the Treasury held for the payment thereof when demanded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, will the Senate agree to this resolution?

Mr. EATON. I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution, if my friend from Delaware will permit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that the first resolution on the Calendar of resolutions?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is. The amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution by adding the following words:

And also whether other moneys of the Government have been, by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, at any time or times since March 4, 1877, deposited with any bank or banks, stating what moneys, the name of the bank or banks, the date and duration of such deposits, the amount thereof monthly, and the terms thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, there is no possible objection to the passage of this resolution, and to obtaining all the information it seeks. I suppose that most Senators are perfectly familiar with the main facts which are now sought to be obtained from the Treasury Department. The only question there is about it is the vast amount of labor which the inquiry is to impose upon the Department. Here is a resolution going back for seventeen years, and going into very many details, asking for information that has not perhaps been communicated in precisely the form here asked for; and this resolution cannot be answered without the labor of very many clerks for many weeks. I only suggest that to the consideration of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. A similar resolution to this passed this body on the 24th day of January, and there has been no indication whatever on the part of the Secretary of a purpose to comply with it, although I dropped him politely a note asking him to comply with it. I am sure the information which I seek here is not known to the great majority of the members of the Senate. I have introduced no resolution to duplicate information in the possession of the Senate, but the object is simply to inquire about matters upon which the public have a right to be informed. It is a simple resolution of inquiry, and I think there ought to be no objection to it from any quarter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, at the expiration of the other morning business, I propose to call up the resolution which I introduced on Friday relative to legislation on appropriation bills, and to address the Senate on the question.

OFFICERS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, Chief Clerk, principal Executive Clerk, and Chaplain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator had better reduce his resolution to writing. If it covers so many we cannot know how many we are to vote upon.

Mr. WALLACE. It is simply a motion to proceed to the election of these officers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania to proceed to the election of these officers the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Chair will put the question. I do not know of any reason for proceeding to the election.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate proceed to the election of the officers named.

Mr. WALLACE. Let the Secretary read the names of the officers.

The SECRETARY. Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, Chief Clerk, principal Executive Clerk, and Chaplain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I am too well aware that nothing which I can say, nothing which any one may say, will arrest or modify the foregone determination to make a sweeping change of the officers and servants of the Senate; a change demanded, not by any deficiencies or neglect of duty on their part, but by the inexorable necessities of political partisanship. Yet, as one who has served long in this body, who has paid some attention to its rules, and who has a profound respect, nay a reverence, for its precedents and its traditions, I am unwilling to see the measure initiated without recording my protest and uttering my unavailing warning to the majority, against the personal discomfort and inconvenience to which they are subjecting themselves and their associates, and the danger to which they are exposing the orderly and decorous transaction of the business of the Senate.

The Senate, except the judiciary, is the most conservative part of the Government. Unlike the House of Representatives, which expires every two years and is renewed fresh from the people, the Senate never dies. The same which it was, when it met, in 1789, it is now, and has held continuous and unbroken existence ever since. Its offices have naturally partaken of its permanent character. Its elective officers are chosen, not for a definite period, but during the pleasure of the Senate, and its subordinate officers have not been, habitually, removed without cause, nor, for many years, without the approval of the Vice-President. This policy has secured to us a corps of trained, experienced, respectful, and efficient servants, who knew that their tenure of office was in their good behavior, not in their political opinions. Since its organization, the Senate has had but six secretaries: the first was Samuel Alyne Otis, who was elected in 1789 and served till his death in 1814, a period of twenty-five years; the second was Charles Cutts, who was elected in 1814 and served till 1825, a period of eleven years; Walter Lowrie was elected in 1825 and served till 1836, a like period of eleven years, when he resigned, and Asbury Dickins was elected, who served till 1861, a period of twenty-five years; the infirmities of age had come to interfere with his attendance upon the Senate and to incapacitate him for the performance of his duties. A republican Senate elected the Chief Clerk, William Hickey, a democrat, acting secretary, continuing Mr. Dickins as Secretary. But the arrangement did not work well. The two did not get on together. Mr. Dickins was unwilling to remit to Mr. Hickey the duties which he could not perform himself. At his suggestion the Senate proceeded to the election of his successor, and provided for the salary of Mr. Dickins for a year, in the course of which he died.

The office required vigorous manhood and the full possession of the physical as well as the intellectual powers that pertain to that condition. John W. Forney was elected in 1861 and served till 1868, when he resigned. Mr. Hickey was continued in the office of chief clerk till 1866, when he died. In 1868 the present efficient and accomplished Secretary was elected, and who is about to be displaced for no complaint or allegation of wrong on his part. How important and dignified the office was regarded is attested by the fact that the first Secretary had been a delegate to the Continental Congress, and his two immediate successors had been members of this body. The others rose to the position through a series of important positions, that manifested the public confidence and the respect of their fellow-citizens.

When I first entered this Chamber the door of the main entrance was opened for me by the venerable man who sits at it now; who had then been here for a period as long as I have remained since, covering a time of forty years. I found in charge of the document-room Moses Titcomb, who had come down from the days of Webster and Clay and Calhoun and Benton, and was esteemed by them all, and was frequently consulted by them on matters of his department. He was a most accomplished man for his position; he seemed to have in his head a catalogue raisonné of all the documents that had been printed from the beginning of the Government. If you wanted an old bill or a forgotten report, belonging to one of the early Congresses, you had but to write the subject, or a hint of the subject, on a card, send it up to him by a page, and the document came down to you. He remained in office till increasing years caused his resignation, and was succeeded by a man who had been trained under his eye, and who partakes largely of his varied and accurate information upon the subjects under his charge. He is still in office; but the hands of the clock are hurrying to his doom.

At that desk sat William J. McDonald who had been, twenty-three years previously, appointed a clerk, on the resignation of his father, a few days before his death, after twenty-seven years' service. Mr. McDonald had then been in service twenty-three years, and remained nineteen years longer, till his death, having risen to the position of chief clerk that was occupied by his father. His son is now in office here. At his death the Senate honored his memory by taking a recess to attend his funeral; his pall was borne by Senators, and his funeral expenses were paid out of the contingent fund. I found here my friend, (Mr. Bassett,) who sits on your left, whose hairs have whitened in the service of the Senate, and who has sat there so long that he seems almost a part of the Chamber. He entered the Senate, nigh fifty years ago as a page, and has risen step by step through his own merit, to the second place in its executive administration. I trust that I violate no confidence when I say that he has recorded the memoirs of his long connection with this body, and that he proposes to give them to the public. They will not fail to form an interesting chapter of American personal history.

I might adduce other examples, but I forbear. Of the hundred and twenty officers of the Senate, I judge that full thirty are democrats, some of whom we found in office, when we came into possession, in 1861, and others have since been selected, through the liberality of the appointing power. Such has been the practice of the Senate. I regret the new departure. I think that it is regretted, on personal grounds, and by a regard for the traditions of the Senate, by many of those who are about to make it, particularly the older Senators, and who are impelled to it by a force which few men have the strength to resist. We on this side of the Chamber have no power to prevent it. We share in the inconvenience, but we have no part in the responsibility.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I think my friend from Rhode Island did not state so distinctly as he might have done, and perhaps ought to have done, one fact in connection with the persons who have held the various offices in this body to which he has referred. He did in gross refer to the number of political opponents of what had been the majority of this body who were allowed to retain places here; but it will be recollected by all who are cognizant of the facts that Mr. Dickins held the office of Secretary through the varied administrations of three distinct parties. He was elected by the democratic party by a very close vote. Subsequent to that period of time the old whig party had control of this body, and they sought not to disturb him. Following them came the republican party, and we sought not to disturb him. He was not removed in the true sense of the word. An election of Mr. Forney was had at Mr. Dickins's own suggestion, and this body provided for an additional year's salary for him before that election took place, and before that year had expired Mr. Dickins deceased. Mr. Hickey, another pronounced democrat, had served here through, I think, the administration of three distinct parties; and the worthy, the accomplished, and I add the beloved officer who sits at your left (Mr. Bassett) has, I think, held through as many. And Mr. McDonald was found here; he was retained and promoted up to the office of Chief Clerk regularly from the position which he held.

Such has been the administration of this body politically. Individually I care very little about the matter; but as a Senator I do say that I regret to see this sweeping removal of the best officers we have and the putting in their places of men who, if equally qualified, will require a long and varied experience before they can discharge their duties equally well. I had hoped the mad spirit of partisanship would not thus run riot in this body, but that the counsels and the practices and the precedents of this body might in a small degree have been observed. It is not to be so, however, and I can only say again that I regret it exceedingly.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, there is no intention to interfere with the business of the Senate by the changes that are contemplated. There is no intent to break down the life of the Senate; it will continue to live. Changes have been made before—changes because of the necessities of party. Mr. Hickey was not supplanted by a man of the political party to which he belonged, nor was Mr. Forney supplanted by a man of a different political party.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator will allow me to say that we waited for him to die before his place was filled, and then we filled it with a democrat.

Mr. WALLACE. The Secretary who preceded Mr. Forney was living, and the gentleman who took his place belonged to the other side in politics. So, in 1869, when the present Secretary of the Senate came to his place, he was well known to be a member of the opposing political party to that which now has a majority in this body. Of his qualifications as an officer, of his ability as a man, of his position as a gentleman, we have naught to say; but that he is a politician every one who hears me knows as well as I do. We simply come to ask that the places which have been in the charge of the other side of the Senate for a period of years may be filled by those who are in accord with the majority. We believe we have gentlemen who are fully competent by character, by position, by acquirements to fill the places that are to be vacated to-day, and that these gentlemen should be in accord with the majority in the body we think is as clear as anything can be.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I have heard nobody present the proposition which the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania answers. I have heard nobody suggest that, if either or all of these places were vacant, it would be improper for the majority of the Senate to fill that place or those places with a person or with persons of their own political persuasion. The Senator from Pennsylvania rises to vindicate the propriety of such action. If the case were here, it would need no vindication. Nobody I think would urge, if the Secretaryship of the Senate were vacant and a proper man could be found, as doubtless he could, in the democratic party, that the democrats ought not to vote for him rather than for some other man of different political standing.

The suggestion made so forcibly by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN,] as I understand it, is wholly different. This is the position: for the first time in the history of the American Senate, for the first time in the history of political parties in this country, a party majority insists upon vacating by removal, without cause, all the chief places of the Senate, to the end that they may put in favorites of their own. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] has said not one word to justify or excuse that. The history of the Senate is against it. The experience of all those who have gone before us disapproves it. The usage and custom of the body has affirmed that these places ought not to be put up in a political raffle and ought not to be made the rewards or the penalties of political service. The unvarying judgment of the past declares that those who hold these places should stand and be allowed to remain on their merits. That all this is to be reversed, is the more noticeable now, because we have heard, the whole country has heard, so much of late about political appointments. Reform in this respect has been thought by organs of democratic sentiment of transcendent urgency. A doctrine of vast wholesomeness and importance has been proclaimed which forbids to-day's doings. Public officers in general, not only these but others, should be allowed to continue, should be encouraged to remain, should be protected in position so long as their personal character remains untarnished and they discharge their duties. This is the substance and nearly the form of the doctrines which the exponents of democratic sentiment have been noisy in adopting and proclaiming. This is the doctrine which has needed only to be preached, whether practiced or not, to earn the applause of all the assailants and traducers of the political party to which I belong.

Now, in the very midst of this awakening, in the very midst of this quickening of the public conscience, here comes for the first time into the Senate a pioneer exaction, one outrunning every exaction of past times and of past party appetite; it is that a besom of destruction shall pass over all the officers of the Senate, or if I may credit the newspaper over all but one—preserved, I suppose, to fulfill the saying that there are exceptions to all rules—that all but one shall be swept away without cause, in the presence of the notorious fact that they are faithful, that they are accomplished, that they are sedulous in the discharge of their duties, and without pretense that their personal character is tarnished. They are all to give way in order that the positions here in this last sanctuary, the positions which, whatever may have been the changes of party control elsewhere, have stood as the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Rhode Island have told us, against the exactions and behest of partisan cupidity, that they too shall at last be subjected to the voracity of those who in political strife have entitled themselves to spoil and booty.

Mr. President, I will content myself with saying in the language of the Senator from Maine that, although a partisan, not shrinking from the logic of partisan action, I too regret that the interest, the business, the convenience of the Senate is to be impaired, as it must be, no matter how meritorious the new-comers, by displacing those trained by long experience and faithfulness in their places, to the end that room may be made for those who, whatever may be their deserts in the arena of politics, are entirely uneducated in the duties which await them.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I heard and was much impressed by the carefully prepared and elaborate speech of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.] There was much that he said of historic interest and truth. There was much, however, omitted, which I will in as restrained phrase as possible endeavor to supply.

I know not how, or scarcely when, the rule came into the practical government of this country that party services were to be rewarded by public office; but I do know that such a rule unrestrainedly exercised is unwholesome, dangerous, and degrading. It has injured the civil service of this country, and unless it shall be in some degree and indeed in a great degree modified, I can plainly see that still further injury, not simply to economy, but to good order and good government, is to accrue.

Sir, there is much in the memories of this Senate deeply impressive to me. No man in this country has a right to feel more than I what is due to the dignity of this body and the respect that it should inculcate, the respect that should follow its example in the conduct of public affairs. I cannot believe that a poor, narrow, proscriptive feeling of political partisanship should govern us in providing the personnel of the official corps required for the important business which we have in hand. I earnestly trust that now when the control of the Senate has passed into the hands of a party with which I am associated, the first thought, ay, and the second thought in its government shall be the welfare of the Government, its dignity, and the preservation of our institutions.

Sir, I do not apprehend that any such "slaughter of the innocents," that any such sweeping system of removal is intended as is so gloomily apprehended by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, nor that the individuals in whose presence commendation (and not undeservedly) has been so freely bestowed, are to fall a speedy sacrifice to what the honorable Senator from New York has termed the voracity of party. But, sir, while we may regret the fact that the offices of the country which were instituted for the benefit of the country and not for the benefit of the incumbents, should be filled not solely with reference to public benefit and public usefulness, still let this other fact run along with it, how much of official power, how much of official emolument, bestowed only for the public welfare has steadily been used primarily for the benefit of a single party! I would not designedly say an ungracious word of any officer of this Senate, from whom personally I have nothing to say but that courtesy and kindness have met me at every turn during the ten years of my service, that in many cases had I even been the agent for their appointments no greater kindness or civility could have met me than that which I have received at their hands. And yet, sir, in those days which we term, and justly, the good old days, in the time and in the history so carefully delineated by my honorable friend from Rhode Island, I ask him in all candor were the offices of this body to which he refers, filled by the men he has described, ever made the engines for the continuation of political power in the hands of the men to whom they were intrusted? It is not unjust to the gentleman who fills the office of Secretary of the Senate, toward whom I have nothing in the world but feelings of personal kindness, to say that he has suffered himself, or has been forced, or has voluntarily been part of the machinery of party; that while holding his office of Secretary of the Senate circulars almost mandatory in their terms have been issued signed by him compelling every Federal officeholder in the country to subscribe from the money of the public paid to them as salaries for the maintenance of the fortunes of one of the political parties.

I say not this merely in a spirit of personal fault-finding but I say it in justice, I say it with regret, because if I had it in my power the Senate indeed should be a continuing body not only as respects its own members but also as to the gentlemen who fill its subordinate offices, so that there should be no possibility of saying that which I do say now with truth and justice in regard to the Secretary of the Senate. If we are to have an end (and pray God that end soon may come) of inquisition as to the personal political opinions of the officers of this body, let us at the same time demand that an end shall also come to their use of official time, power and official emolument for the purpose of continuing themselves in office and their political party in power.

There are men in the employ of the Senate of long service, whose political opinions I apprehend to be different from my own, and whose independence in that respect I would not put forth my little finger to prevent, whose fidelity, whose courtesy, whose integrity and whose special knowledge of their duty is such that I personally will never consent shall be passed by and they shall give place to some unprepared, unfitted, eager political seeker of place of my own way of political thinking. But, Senators, do not, where you have filled an office deliberately with a zealous political partisan, complain and make objection to the action of these against whom and against whose cherished political convictions his office, his emolument, his faculties have all been actively enlisted. Do not affect surprise or complain when he is removed from office by the majority against whom he has strenuously exerted himself. Do not put or attempt to put such a case as that in the same category with the causeless removal of a gentleman content to hold his individual political opinions but not given to use his time, place, and office for the purpose of preventing the political success of those of his political opponents into whose hands the responsibility and control of the business of this body have at length passed.

I should be glad indeed, sir, and I will try to do my part in making the selection of officers for this body, whether by retaining them in position or by replacing them, to make fidelity, capacity, high personal character, and fitness for the position, I will not say the primary, but the controlling reasons for my vote.

I know not who was the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate between 1861 and 1869. I may say as a fact that among the many applications made to me for official position under the control of this body, many have been from persons indorsed as men of unexceptionable character, excellent standing in the community, by men of all parties, who were removed and who ask to-day for restoration to places in the Senate; and their removal took place in 1861 up to which time the Senate had been in the control of a majority composed of the political party to which I am attached and which the present majority of the Senate Chamber represents.

But I am not here to put myself or those with whom I act in the Chamber upon the same grade of action with those who preceded them. I am not one of those who believe that two wrongs can make a right. I am not disposed in any way to justify irregular, undignified, or ultra partisan action, because examples to that effect have preceded us from those to whom I am opposed. On the contrary I should prefer, and my counsels should and shall be given, that worth, capacity, integrity, and intelligence, shall be the guides of the majority in this Chamber in supplying the official corps of the Senate; and unless these requirements are met, unless improvement in every respect is to be obtained, for one I do not desire to have mere change that is not also intended to be improvement.

I regret that the truth of history has compelled me to supply the omissions of the honorable Senator from Rhode Island. Of the spirit of gratitude in which he spoke of faithful service wherever or by whomsoever illustrated, I only can say my heart gives a hearty echo and response; but he must consider that within the last eighteen years of rule a different spirit from that to which he has referred with so much just admiration has controlled the administration of public affairs, things have been done which would not have been permitted in the days to which he referred. Never was there a prior instance in the history of this body when the Secretary of the Senate was the chairman of the executive committee of one of the political parties engaged in a heated canvass signing himself as such, making his demands and levying his contributions as such. I am corrected; not as chairman but as secretary; it matters not which, he acted as the executive officer of that committee, signing his name officially as such, under the authority of his party.

I do not care at this time, Mr. President, to carry this course of remark further. I might do so. I might take this occasion most gravely to remind this Senate and to remind the country that the use of official power in elections is absolutely fatal to any government designing to procure and to secure its freedom by a recurrence to free elections. One of the greatest commentators upon the laws of the country from which we chiefly draw our institutions, Sir William Blackstone, has stated that when the offices of a country, the official power of a country are employed to control the elections, what is it, says he, but cutting up government by the very roots? And yet with what force does such a commentary bear upon things so painfully fresh in our recollection. The instances are only too numerous and obvious; they will occur to every one, and I do not care on this occasion to make them more pointed by giving personal illustrations of the great and extended danger to the peace and permanence of the institutions of this Government to which they have given rise.

No, sir. I blame no man for partisanship. It is a question of his conscience, and by his conscience alone it is to be restrained so long as he does not hold official power, meant for the benefit of all, given to him as a sacred trust for the benefit of all, and yet to use it only for his personal continuance in office and the advancement of his party. Sir, such use of political power is the violation of a trust; it cannot be approved, it ought not to be supported; and for my own part I wish sincerely the time to come, and I hope the people of this country in their good sense will soon compel it to arrive, when, while they will not seek to interfere with the individual independence and freedom of each man in office or out of office to vote according to his judgment and his conscience, they will neither permit official power to be used in the interest of a party nor permit the official positions of the country to be viewed in no higher light than the reward for merely partisan service.

The evil is one too plain to be denied; it is one that every thoughtful man has looked upon with grave apprehensions; but it is one that does exist, and in the nature of things the Senators who sit on the other side of the Chamber would not think that they were serving the interest, the business of the country, to select for maintenance in office an official who had steadily and primarily used his capacities, his official position and emoluments, as a mere stepping-stone for the future success of his party and the maintenance of himself in office.

Now, sir, in the selections which are to be made of these principal officers of the Senate I would not wish to say one word of unkindness or of depreciation of any one, but I believe that when the lamented death of Major McDonald, our late Chief Clerk, occurred it was the impression of the entire Senate that there was great difficulty, almost an impossibility, in securing the services of any one equal in peculiar fitness for that place, and that the worthy and excellent gentleman who had assisted him went there but temporarily, and that such was the understanding that his appointment there was but temporary. Many of the services rendered by Major McDonald are not and cannot for physical as well as other reasons be so well rendered by Mr. Spencer. As a reader we all know what constant and continued labors Major McDonald performed efficiently. We have seen that his successor cannot or has not rendered them. I mention these facts in all frankness in order that the idea may not be taken by our friends on the other side of the Chamber or go abroad to the country that this is a sudden, relentless, inconsiderate removal of tried and worthy officers without due cause and reflection.

As I said before, there are many remaining in the service of the Senate who I trust will be retained, and that long service, fidelity, intelligence, and character shall outweigh anything of partisan rapacity that may be supposed to demand their removal.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I want to hear read the resolution pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate do now proceed to the election of its Secretary, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, Chief Clerk, principal Executive Clerk, and Chaplain.

Mr. CONKLING. I asked for the reading of the resolution not that it may appear in front of the few words I shall say, but that it may appear at the conclusion of remarks which have fallen from the honorable Senator from Delaware. He has seen fit to decorate with his censure the Secretary of the Senate; he has also declared that one of the clerks of the Senate does not read well; and logically I suppose we are to infer that all the officers named in the resolution are to be removed, because of what the Senator has said touching the Secretary and one reading clerk.

Mr. President, if I heard the Senator from Delaware aright he implied, if he did not state, that the present Secretary of the Senate had from his office, meaning I take it his office of Secretary of the Senate, sent out duns or applications for political contributions. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to understand whether I heard him aright?

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, no. I do not know whether this gentleman sat in the room to which the honorable Senator has referred at the time he issued these—I called them either orders or petitions, I forget which, soliciting subscriptions from the office-holders of the country. But I do say this, and I meant to be understood to say this, that while he was holding the office of Secretary of the Senate he was also the executive officer of the national committee of his political party, and that holding that office his official power and time were given to his party ends in the way I have suggested.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware did, I think, observe that the Secretary of the Senate from his office had sent out such requests; and he fortified his allegation by saying, with somewhat more strength of phrase than he has employed just now, that the Secretary of the Senate employed his official place, and at one point of his remarks I think he said his official character, to promote the plans and designs of a political party. As the friend of the Secretary of the Senate, as one glad to be his friend, as one who has noticed his manliness, his faithfulness, the thoroughness and alertness with which he has discharged his duties at all times, I wish to put on record a denial of every part of that assertion which in my estimation reflects injuriously on him. I deny, on information which I think it safe to rely upon, that he ever in his official character or from his office as Secretary of the Senate or in derogation of his official duties, or attentiveness as Secretary of the Senate, sent out notices, letters, applications, or anything else for the benefit of any political party.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator a question? Do I understand him to say that he denies that Mr. George C. Gorham signed and sent out circulars during the political canvass of 1878 as the representative of the republican party asking for pecuniary contributions to aid the cause of that party?

Mr. CONKLING. Supposing it will be equally agreeable to the Senator from Delaware, I will make the statement that I intended to make, which will cover quite fully the question which he now asks. In the same connection I deny emphatically that the Secretary of the Senate has ever employed his subordinates, or the subordinates of the Senate, to do any of the work to which the honorable Senator from Delaware has referred. In short, I deny every part of this accusation, unless some part of it is supported by the statement I will now make.

Not the Secretary of the Senate but the individual who holds the office of Secretary of the Senate, during the vacation and absence of the Senate, when he had no official duties to interfere with his doing so, did act as the secretary of a committee the mission of which was to distribute documents, to carry on correspondence, and to do the various lawful proper things, as well known I suppose to other Senators as to me, ordinarily done by what is termed a campaign committee, a political committee, a partisan committee. It may be designated in any way, so that it be truly designated. Its business was to carry on a political campaign not for the benefit of all parties but for the benefit of the one party for whose interest it stood, and whose tenets and measures it promulgated.

Mr. Gorham was the secretary of such a committee, or of an executive subcommittee of such a committee, and as secretary he did when present the customary labors of a secretary. His action, I repeat, was wholly or almost wholly in the vacation of the Senate, when the Senate was not here and when his so giving attention to the interest of the political party to which he belonged had no more influence in withholding his attention to his duties, than his attendance of church on Sunday.

If the Senator from Delaware thinks that his statement and his implications are justified by the fact as it has now been stated, which I repeat I am instructed is the whole fact in its broadest dimensions, he will adhere to his statement no doubt; and those who have listened to his statement and those who listen now to what is intended to be a fair presentation of the whole truth will judge how far the officer in question justly falls under the reprobation of honorable men. On this point I beg to say a few words further.

When the Senator from Delaware goes to the hustings in his State, or in New Jersey, or in the various other places from which we are permitted to hear by repetition in the newspapers his voice urging the claims of the democratic party upon the confidence of the country, is it true that he neglects his duties as a Senator, that he prostitutes and perverts the instrumentalities and powers of his official place? Is it true that he does that which is blameworthy or dishonorable? If he does not, what is the divine right of members of this body? We are all office-holders. What are the special immunities, not possessed by other officials, possessed by my eloquent friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] which make it proper for him to go out and address the people, to act as chairman of a committee, to wield and carry on the instrumentalities and agencies which make up the sum of action and discussion in a political campaign? Is it dishonorable because he is a Senator? It is improper, I submit, in the case of any Senator, if he abandons his seat, turns his back upon his duties, and neglects his official trust; but in no other case is it dishonorable. On the contrary, the very genius of our Government makes it laudable. Why? Because ours is a Government operating by universal suffrage, and controlled by majorities. Ours is a Government the chief glory of which is that no man is called upon to obey any law which he has not his full share in enacting. It is a free and just Government because there is no select, no privileged, class to which political liberty and power is confided. It is free because every man, the clergyman in the pulpit, the banker in his counting-house, the railway president or director in his office, the employé of a corporation, the poorest, the humblest citizen, although he may discharge daily menial offices for the smallest pay—it is free because everybody, from the richest to the poorest, from the highest to the lowest, and no more the highest than the lowest, has his aliquot share of right, of power, of duty to advance and render potent, if he honestly can, those public principles and measures, and those candidates too, whose success will in his belief conduce to the general welfare and advantage.

In my belief nothing is more fallacious, nothing is more vicious, nothing is more invasive of the rights of citizenship, than the idea that any man, because he holds a public office, is thereby robbed of the right to do as an individual, without neglecting his official duties, those proper, honest, lawful acts which other individuals may do to influence public sentiment, to modify the action of parties, and to promote just results in popular elections.

Mr. President, if the reverse of this is true, who is to vote and to participate in politics in this country? Who in assemblages of the people and in political campaigns is to take part? If it be said that the Secretary of the Senate during the months when the Senate does not sit, when he is comparatively at leisure, can take no part, because he is the employé of the Senate, whose employé is to take part? What class of the American people is not the employé and agent of somebody? The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] is a lawyer; he is a professional man practicing his profession. It may be said that he is not the employé in this sense of his clients; the same may be said of other professional men. Who else, save the rich and the idle, is not in some sense the agent in the employ of another? Is it true that all the men in all the factories and mills and machine-shops and dry-goods stores and other stores, all the men employed in all the industries of the country, violate the duties of their employment if they take part in leisure hours in political affairs? Is that the truth, and the safe evangel of citizenship? Is it true that a man who is president of a bank or president of an insurance company, or secretary of a corporation, and who in the evening or in vacant days or hours acts as a member of a political committee, acts officially, acts in his official character, and prostitutes and uses improperly the instrumentalities of his business employment, or business station?

I will not pursue this at length, but I mean here and everywhere, the occasion being proper, to utter my protest against the idea, if it is a sincere idea with anybody, that any class of American citizens give up their political rights or any portion of them by assuming employment for anybody else. Whoever hires as a public officer or a private employer any citizen buys so much of his time. During that time the employer is entitled to the attention and exertion of the agent or servant. If the person he hires be a devotee of religion, and if on week days and in hours of business, he attends divine service, the employer has a right to say "No, this is a part of the time I buy; you must be here, or you must give place to somebody who will be here." But when the clock has struck the hour, and the service which was bargained for has been rendered, when the time which was engaged has elapsed, be the employer the Senate of the United States or the Government of the United States, or the State of Connecticut, or one of the insurance companies of the State of Connecticut, the employer has no more right than any other man to follow up the agent, the servant, the person employed, in hours which are his own, and dictate what shall be the bestowal of those hours, or in what direction his political or his religious convictions shall run.

That, Mr. President, is as true in my belief of the Secretary of the Senate as it is of anybody else, and he is as free from blame as anybody else.

I venture to say one other thing. If any corporation in the State of New York, where there are some large corporations, should undertake to say that the persons employed should not only attend and work during all the hours of their employment, but that they should be followed into retirement afterward, and attempts should be made to dictate or coerce their political action, there is no corporation so strong that it would not be compelled to desist, or else be swept away and trampled down before just and popular indignation. I find nothing blamable in the fact that the gentleman now in question, without any pretended neglect of his official duties, was true to his political convictions; but the honorable Senator from Delaware does find something sinful in it, and if I may infer anything from his remarks, he means to excuse or to justify this long list of removals, particularly the removal of the Secretary of the Senate, because the Secretary of the Senate belonging to a political party acted as secretary of a committee of that party during a vacation of the Senate.

It has been said that "consistency is a jewel." It may not be amiss to try this proposition for a moment by the test of consistency. I believe, speaking of a House of Representatives which has passed away, I shall violate no rule if I say that the democratic majority of the last House chose Mr. Thompson, of Ohio—naturally if not of course, from Ohio, [laughter]—as the chief executive officer of the House of Representatives. The selection was discreet, for politicians it was a natural choice, because they know how prolific Ohio is of strong and sinewy political men. They wanted a democrat of "grip and gather," so they chose Mr. Thompson, and straightway Mr. Thompson, if I am correctly informed, (if I am not the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] will be good enough to correct me,) was chosen not secretary, not scribe, oh no, no subordinate place for him, but chairman of the democratic executive committee in the great political Commonwealth of Ohio. And we read in the newspapers of the power and dexterity with which he wielded the great instrumentalities of that exalted station, of the all manner of things he did, not as secretary but as the head man who guided the political sword the blade of which was everywhere and the hilt in the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives.

Now we are bound to suppose that every well-conducted democrat must have been dreadfully shocked at such a spectacle. We are bound to suppose so, but we are not allowed to suppose so, because if it were not a violation of the rules of the Senate I should say that the present democratic House has proceeded to re-elect Mr. Thompson. So that now by a new lease of authority Mr. Thompson unites in his august person the solemn prerogatives of the democratic executive committee of the State of Ohio, and also those other prerogatives inhering in the office of Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives. Who protested against that? Who proposed to remove Mr. Thompson for what he had done?

Mr. EATON. You would if you had the power. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. My friend from Connecticut is a very rash man. He says that I would if I had the power. [Laughter.] Mr. President, that would depend very much on whether I acted as a democrat or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. Suppose you were a democrat.

Mr. CONKLING. Ah, my friend need not say that; he knows the impossibility of that supposition. There is no possible room for mistake there [laughter] any more than there was the other day when he seemed to be a little confused as to which party is republican.

No, Mr. President, if Mr. Thompson were a republican and he had discharged his duties as Sergeant-at-Arms and during a vacation of the House of Representatives had gone into his own State and honestly and manfully, as I presume he did, uplifted the banner of the party to which he belonged, and tried by fair means to achieve victory for it, so far from removing him for that, I should say he acted a man's part; the fact that he has strong political convictions commends him to me because men who have much strength to hold convictions with are very likely to have strong convictions, strongly held; and if an officer discharges his duties faithfully so that his employer, be his employer the State or his neighbor, takes no harm, if his stewardship is faithful, then the last thing whereof I should complain would be that by honorable means and efforts he sought to give effect to the ideas he honestly held, whether those ideas pertained to political, civil, or religious rights.

I file no accusation against Mr. Thompson. I only say when the honorable Senator from Delaware fell into the error of supposing that Mr. Gorham was chairman of a committee, of which he was not chairman, he had before him just such a case as I have pointed to, not the only one to which I might point by any means, where the party to which that honorable Senator belongs, almost in our very presence acting upon the reverse of the doctrine he has announced, sanctions, continues, and, with the nation looking on, rewards a man for doing exactly that, in greater measure, which is laid at the door of the gentleman who holds the office of Secretary of the Senate as if the act was discreditable.

Mr. President, one other word, and I have done. The honorable Senator from Delaware said men have come to him who were removed in 1861, and they want to come back. "The eternal fitness of things" receives no shock in this. I was here in 1861. Abraham Lincoln called me here as he did the other members of the two Houses. The call was to come here on the 4th of July in the presence of a dire public emergency. There were a good many vacancies in the Senate then. They were not all in the places of the employés of the Senate. A good many chairs were vacant then which are occupied now. Those who held them did not come to claim them. They were not like the men in the Scriptures, one of whom had bought a farm, and another a yoke of oxen, and another had married a wife, and were thus detained by a variety of engagements; one general public engagement made demand upon a large number not only of the officers but of the members of the Senate, and they were absent on one and the same errand. When the Senate convened, so much of the Senate as remained, after sedition, privy conspiracy, and rebellion had commenced its work, proceeded to fill the vacancies in needed subordinate places, and proceeded, as far as I remember, to make a change in one office—the Sergeant-at-Arms, and there were two good reasons for a change, neither of which it is necessary for me to state except so far as I have already indicated.

Now it appears that the subordinates who in 1861 disappeared from the sphere of their former usefulness are back demanding, in the language of a court of equity, to be put in statu quo; the Senator on my right [Mr. HAMLIN] suggests "ante bellum." That is good Latin, and sometimes good law, but it would be pernicious politics and unjustifiable practice now. But here they are—these vanished few, and I am willing to have it disclosed that their being here is a reason why all these places are to be opened to new appointments. They are to be made vacant because a procession of former occupants has returned, arguing probably that the same logic which has brought back into the once vacant seats of the Senate those who have restoring power, a disposition to restore should not be wanting.

The whole inquiry is really suggestive, interesting, and full of reminiscence. A Senator hands me a list of the men, not republicans but democrats, democrats with all the later variations and modern improvements, democrats who have been kept here in place all along, a list I hope as meritorious as it is multitudinous. This is non-partisan emphatically, but now, for such reasons as we have heard, for the first time in American history the places and employments of the Senate are to be subjected to the hungry behests of party. So be it. It will undoubtedly lead to those reprisals which come from that wild Indian justice called retaliation; I am sorry for it. Now, the pendulum has swung to that side of the arc. Presently it will swing back; and then the men who look on to-day and see this proceeding will come with an argument in their mouths which it will be difficult to answer; those who are then here as Senators will be summoned to act upon that argument. The seekers for place will say "If it was good doctrine that men who went out in 1861, who were allowed or compelled to go out then, ought to be in 1879 brought back and restored, it certainly is sound doctrine that we who, without fault, without allegation, without pretense of short-coming, were driven out by main force, driven out in the hot and famished chase for place, shall be put back," and so we shall have inaugurated at last what was avoided at first and ever since, a system under which the places of the Senate are to be made the price and the spoil of partisan activity and personal favoritism.

As I said before, Mr. President, partisan as I am, with no pretensions to special holiness on any subject, I believe this is just matter of regret, unless I greatly mistake, discerning people at large will view it with regret; and unless I still more mistake, its causes, its lessons, its real truth, will not be hidden behind a thin veil of sophistry or casuistry.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I should not have been surprised upon another occasion to hear the views expressed by the honorable Senator from New York, because I have either heard him express them before or I have seen them attributed to him by public account; but I confess that I cannot understand his reasoning when, rising in his place gravely to deprecate the instability of part of the civil service of the country, the official positions of the Senate, he yet would advocate and advise for an official corps, which in order to be permanent must be non-partisan, that very action which must be fatal to its permanence.

The Senator cannot discern, he says, any difference between the right of one of the officials of the Government to take an active part on the hustings and the right of any Senator or Representative so to do. I do not think that others will have the same difficulty in the discrimination that he seems to find. This is a country governed by popular opinion, and men stand or fall in political office by the way in which that current sets. Its ebb and its flow bears men into and out of this Chamber, and upon the acceptability of the opinions they hold to the public, so does their tenure of power and office depend.

Why, sir, the question is not as to those elective offices which represent, and properly represent, the tide and the change in popular opinion, and it is not stability as to them which we are now considering; it is as to the ministerial offices of the Republic, what may be termed without disrespect to the occupants the inferior machinery of the Republic, those offices for the performance of which individual opinions of the incumbent make but little difference one way or the other, offices which do not affect great questions of public policy but depend entirely upon the accuracy, the fidelity, the integrity with which their functions are performed, offices which should not and were not intended to be swept to and fro as to their occupancy by the changing tide of popular opinion. And so if the Senator cannot comprehend the difference between those leaders of public opinion or those placed in the positions to lead public opinion, to illustrate it, and to guide it, if he will still confound them with the mere ministerial function of the civil service, I think that he will find the public can better discern than he professes himself able to do.

Take the country from which our institutions are in the main derived. Men come into or go out of Parliament, the Cabinet, and the leading offices, according to the wave of popular opinion, and stand or fall by it; but there is no such change as to the merely clerical and subordinate offices. They believe, and I think wisely, that trained men, of approved capacity and character, are essential to be kept there for the sake of permanence in the machinery of the Government, and that public benefit is not derived from a change in the merely ministerial body of the civil service. That is a distinction which is clearly appreciable, whether the honorable Senator from New York would apply it in this case or no. I would have in this country, had I my way, the civil service filled by the men fittest to perform it, and the controlling reason that should place them and keep them there would be the interest and welfare of the Republic. Every man will regret that such offices have been subjected to the changing tide of party success. Yet the honorable Senator, while urging here retention in offices, would affix upon the officers the duties and tasks, and invite them to the occupations, of partisans, and not expect them to share the fate and the lot of partisans.

Why, sir, may I be pardoned for referring to William J. McDonald, that excellent man whose place as Chief Clerk of this body was so well filled for thirty years? Who ever heard in his day and time that he was issuing political circulars and levying contributions upon the office-holders of the country under one pretense or another? The Senator may find warrant satisfactory for him to say that from the office and over his name ex officio, Mr. Gorham did not send out his circulars of demand and levy upon the office-holders of the country. But whether it was as the Secretary of the Senate or whether it was as the secretary of the republican executive committee, it was the man, the same hand signed the circular, the same mind directed the demand, the same hand received the subscription from the officers of the country for what? For lubricating the wheels of one of the political parties and continuing the writer and his party still longer in power. Sir, I may say this with perfect confidence in what will be the answer of any gentleman on the other side of the Chamber, that if the late lamented William J. McDonald had exhibited one-tenth of the interest so vigorously, publicly, and persistently taken by the present Secretary of the Senate, that party majority which, with honor to itself, with justice to him and to the country, maintained him where his admirable abilities were made most useful to his country, would have caused his seat quickly to become vacant, and every one of them would have thought himself justified in it because as an official he had stepped far beyond the enjoyment of his individual opinion and had sought to use his office, and emolument, in the cause of a party whose political doctrines were disapproved by the majority who had the control of his appointment.

It will not do to state before the country that elective offices held by representative men, called upon at intervals to give an account of their stewardship to their constituency, in which members of the Senate and the House and others holding office by election, who stand or fall by the acceptability or the denial of doctrines which they announce—it will not do to class these representatives of public opinion with that great body of ministerial officers who for the sake of public welfare should have stability in office in order to become competent for their duties and be removed beyond the mere casual and temporary ebb and flow of political opinion.

Now, sir, it so happens that in speaking of removals that had taken place in the offices of this body I said that applications had been made to me by persons who were removed by the dominant majority in this Chamber in 1861. I regret that the honorable Senator from New York should not have been able to restrain his political animosity sufficiently to take my statement in the sense in which I intended it. I referred to no man who left this Chamber voluntarily to take sides in the late war against the Government or its laws. The men to whom I referred were those who have remained as faithful, as law-abiding, as attached to the Union of the States and its Government, as the Senator himself. Nay, further so far as the mere neutrality of politics is concerned, two of them I believe were residents of the District and unable to cast any vote at all in favor of either party, and the causes of their removal I cannot imagine; but their characters personally as vouched for by men of both parties in this District were such as made me believe they could not have been removed for cause. I mean by "cause," except to make way for some one who more closely represented the political opinions of the majority. Therefore, sir, it was a very unjust inference on the part of the Senator from New York to suppose that I had reference to any man who had linked his fortunes with "the lost cause," and I am sorry that I even gave him the opportunity to bring into this debate in any way memories so unhappy and which I had hoped were to be buried, or rather which were never again to be made partisan forces in discussions in this Chamber.

Now, sir, no one could be more unwilling than I to state unjustly the position of another, the more especially as he is not upon the floor to reply to me. If there was inaccuracy in my terming the present Secretary the chairman of the republican executive committee, let me correct it and say that he was its secretary. Still what I meant to say was that he was its organ, and I have read in public prints circulars sent by him to postmasters and other officers of the Government of the United States calling upon them for pecuniary subscriptions in aid of the party cause which he represented officially as the representative of the executive committee of a party, he holding at the same time the office of Secretary of the Senate of the United States. That is all that I meant to say, and that I think is borne out by the facts, and from that I do not understand the honorable Senator from New York is instructed to dissent.

I know, Mr. President, that there is something that has been attempted by the present Administration in respect of alleged reformation in the way of procuring a permanent civil service, and I know very well how little approval it has met from the honorable Senator from New York. He daily gives us evidence of that; no, I will not say daily but constantly he has given evidence in his utterances in this Chamber and elsewhere. He evidently does not believe in the doctrine and rules of civil-service reform as set forth in the famous circular of the President of the United States.

I was thinking more of a collision between the supposed authority of party, vested in the present Secretary of the Senate—I mean vested in the individual who holds that office at this time—in making a demand upon a certain postmaster in one of the Western States, whose name fails me at the moment, and who published a reply in which he insisted upon the spirit and meaning of the President's order that he should not respond except voluntarily to a demand upon him for pecuniary subscription to the party fund. It was that correspondence that was in my mind at the time the honorable Senator from Rhode Island here rose and made the very elaborate speech to which I have referred; and it was because there were reasons arising from the partisan action of the present Secretary that never were applicable to his predecessors whose retention in office continued through the various administrations which were referred to by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island that I made the statement I did for the truth of history and for the justice of this case. Not one word of intended depreciation, not one word of lecturing on the subject, was intended by me to these officers; but the fact is pregnant, the fact will be publicly and well understood, the two cases do not stand upon the same foundation, and all I can say is that if the views expressed by the honorable Senator from New York are to prevail, I shall regret it, and I think the country will have great cause to mourn it. When it is understood that officers in our civil service, those whom I have designated as the ministerial officers for the business of the country, that official machinery upon which the Government in order to run smoothly must rest stably, and who can only gain that proficiency required for their places by experience and by being retained as they are found fit and worthy—if that is to be disregarded and they are to be invited and told that it is equally the glory with them as it is of the elective officers of the country to control public opinion, I am afraid that the public business will indeed suffer, that it will go to the winds, and that we shall find ourselves involved in a system so falsely economic and so corrupt, so unstable, that the necessity for change will force itself upon the public mind and permanence will have to be found in some way. I repeat, among my reasons and strong reasons for desiring to retain a worthy official in a ministerial place is the fact that he has not been a zealous and an active partisan. God forbid that he should not be a conscientious and an independent voter—I repeat, in the language of Blackstone, he who uses the offices of a country to control its elections, cuts up its government by the roots.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I will take but a very few minutes to state the question as I understand it. The Senator from New York very well said at the close of his remarks that the real truth could not be hidden under any amount of words. I agree with him. We are simply brought face to face with this condition of things. We are required to elect four or five officers of the Senate under existing rules, and the political parties have to vote either for their friends or their enemies. The question is, Shall the democratic party so vote as to place a salary of $6,000 a year into the hands of the very able republican secretary of its national executive committee, in order to enable him when he shall have leisure, to carry out the argument of the Senator from New York—as I hope he will at the end of ten days—to devote his time, his energies, the knowledge he has acquired, with the money we are urged to furnish him, to run the campaign in New York, Ohio, and California, as he will do ably and well if we furnish him the money to do it with?

That is the question stripped of its oratory, and we are told by leading republican Senators that we are demoralizing the country and disgracing the Senate because we see fit to vote for a democrat in place of the very able secretary of the national republican executive committee, and gentlemen stand here apparently shocked and deliver sermons, hold up their hands in holy horror, and tell us we are seeking to deprive the Secretary of his rights as a freeman and to infringe the exercise of the privilege he has as an American citizen by electing another gentleman as our Secretary. A wonderful amount of eloquence has been expended on this subject. I am willing that he shall continue secretary of the national executive committee of the republican party, but I am not willing as a democrat to vote the money of the people into his pocket so as to enable him to carry on his political campaigns. When I am obliged to vote, as I am, for one man rather than another, as the rules of the Senate require me when that election is held to so vote, I shall vote in such a way as to aid and sustain my own party, and in such a way that the republicans shall furnish their own means to pay their own secretary to carry on their campaigns. That is all.

To show how active a partisan he is and was, let me refer to the fact that on May 27, 1878, during the session of the Senate, for we sat until the 20th of June, 1878, he issued the following order:

HEADQUARTERS OF THE REPUBLICAN CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE, 1878,
1319 F street northwest, Washington, D. C.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 27, 1878.

SIR: This committee, charged with laboring for the success of the republican cause in the coming campaign for the election of members of Congress, call with confidence upon you, as a republican, for such a contribution in money as you may feel willing to make, hoping that it may not be less than $16.

"Modest! in that instance."

The committee deem it proper, in thus appealing to republicans generally, to inform those who happen to be in Federal employ that there will be no objection in any official quarter to such voluntary contribution.

The importance of the pending struggle cannot easily be exaggerated. That the Senate is to be democratic after the 4th of March, 1879, is very nearly a certainty. In view of this, the election of a democratic House of Representatives would precipitate upon the country dangerous agitations, which would inevitably add to present distresses. Foremost among their schemes, the opposition already announce their intention to attempt the revolutionary expulsion of the President from his office.

If, by the presentation of three candidates for the Presidency in 1880, the people should fail to choose, the House must elect, each State delegation casting one vote.

From what is now known, and with the growing dissensions in the camp of the enemy, the committee have good reason to enter upon their work with courage.

Please make prompt and favorable response to this letter, and remit at once, by draft or postal money-order, to "Sidney F. Austin, esq., treasurer, &c., German-American National Bank, Washington, D. C."

By order of the committee.

GEO. C. GORHAM,
Secretary.

Mr. CONKLING. The most prophetic paper I ever heard.

Mr. BECK. And the date shows that it was during the session of the Senate. The Senator from New York said it was during his leisure hours that he had performed all this service for his party. This was while the Senate was in session.

Mr. CONKLING. No, I was not mistaken about that. The committee, as we all remember on both sides, was organized as a congressional committee before Congress went away, but Mr. Gorham did not enter upon the active duties till the vacation. I observe the date and see that his name was used there, but I take it the Senator from Kentucky need not be told that that does not imply that Mr. Gorham with his own hand wrote that circular or sent it.

Mr. BECK. I did not know that any person on the national executive republican committee was in the habit of forging the name of the secretary. [Laughter.] It was issued May 27, 1878.

Mr. CONKLING. I should be glad to claim that that was the composition of Mr. Gorham because, although it might not show that he was an extraordinarily able Secretary, as a prophet it would certainly show that he is not to be sneezed at.

Mr. BECK. There is no man who disparages his ability; but he is so able that we cannot afford to keep him in the office of Secretary to use it for the purposes for which he will use it and for which he always has used it; if he was not an able man we might care less about it; but when he is known to be as able as he is, as well informed as he is, and known to have the means of coercing money from all the Federal officials as he has done and will do, the democrats of the Senate would be false to themselves if they were to retain him in this high office when we have the power to substitute another man and a good democrat for him. The Senator from New York said, among other things, with great earnestness, look at the House of Representatives; look at the Sergeant-at-Arms of that body; he is from Ohio, chairman of the democratic committee of that great State; and Ohio is a great State and full of great men seeking great offices. Well, sir, the republican party within the last two weeks held a caucus in the House of Representatives and unanimously voted to turn that man out of office, and they were right, just as we are right in turning out Mr. Gorham; and when they had to hunt up a candidate for Speaker of the House to run against the present incumbent, Mr. RANDALL, they had to go to that great State of Ohio themselves to find Mr. GARFIELD to run the race against him.

Mr. CONKLING. Both sides have to go there.

Mr. BECK. It is a great State; that is known to us all. But waiving all outside issues, the country may as well understand that we cannot afford to retain Mr. Gorham, and the republican party would not employ a democratic political partisan who was chairman of the great executive political committee of the country in the office of Secretary of the Senate if they had a man of their own who was qualified to fill it. We avow, at least I do, that we do not intend to keep one of your partisans there, because we have the power to turn him out. The country expects us to do it; you would do it; anybody would do it when we have as good a man to put in as you have there now. When you prate about civil-service reform I would like to commend republican gentlemen, and in this I go further than my friend from Delaware, who thinks some exertions have been made by this administration to reform the civil service, to pages 48 and 49 of the report of the Potter committee, where they will find seventy-five men, among them Mr. Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, one of the judges of the Supreme Court, Mr. Hale of Maine, offered the position of Postmaster-General; Mr. Stoughton, minister to Russia; Mr. Kasson, minister to Austria; Mr. Hawley, commissioner to Paris; Mr. Coburn, commissioner to Hot Springs; Mr. KELLOGG, now in the Senate—in short, seventy-five men munificently provided for at the public expense, every one of them especially because they were the men who either as visiting statesmen or as manipulators of the elections in Florida and Louisiana aided the present Administration to obtain power. They were thus rewarded, notwithstanding the civil-service reform which has been spoken of so highly; yet when the democratic side seeks to vote for a friend of their cause rather than for an admitted partisan, who by the confession of his friends is a leader, and no doubt when his party comes into power either in California or here will be promoted, and ought to be promoted as an active, efficient man, we are to be called revolutionists. Sir, Mr. Gorham does not expect us, and never did expect us, to retain him, and he would not now write a paper over his signature saying that he expected us to retain him as Secretary. He made his fight to turn us out; he made it ably and well; he was beaten; and he has to go where so many of you went not long ago, into a minority and out of office. [Laughter.] If you win again, his political service has been such, and no doubt will continue to be such, as to entitle him again to your confidence. You may restore him if you ever get back into a majority again. We may as well speak plainly to each other, if we say anything; we cannot afford to throw grass while you throw stones; we intend to stand by our friends and organize the Senate in our interest.

I said I did not rise to make a speech, but desired to state the issue clearly, as I understand it, so that the country may understand it. I admit that we do not intend to keep a leader of the republican party as our Secretary and pay him a salary of $6,000 a year to run the campaigns for his party, either in his leisure moments or any other moments during this summer, either in California, Ohio, New York, or anywhere else; and all this lamentation that is made over him by gentlemen on the other side does not meet any response either from the country or from him, as he neither asks it, desires it, nor expects it. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The galleries will keep quiet.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire in a very few words to place this question before the Senate as it occurs to my mind. I have no assault to make on any outgoing officer, and I have no excuse to make for voting against him. By the will of the American people the Senate has come to have a majority on the democratic side, and in my judgment the officers of this body ought to be in substantial harmony with the majority of it. The majority of this body will be held responsible before the people of this country for its management. We shall be held responsible for what occurs in the office of our Secretary. We shall be held, and justly held, responsible for what takes place in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms, for the management and secrecy of our executive sessions; and I for one say, without a moment's hesitation, that when I have to choose between my political friends and my political enemies for places of trust, honor, and profit, I stand by my friends, as I have always asked them to stand by me. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order.

Mr. VOORHEES. And in saying that I mean no reflection upon gentlemen of different political opinions from myself; I mean no reflection upon the outgoing Secretary of this body. A partisan politician of course he is, and he uses one of the keenest blades in the United States. I would not vote to turn him out merely on that account, but because he is not of my political faith and I am not of his.

These cries and lamentations that have been set up here to-day by the Senators on the opposite side will not deceive anybody. No sensible people throughout the United States expected this body to do otherwise than what has now been proposed. The funeral wails that have been heard are mere mockeries and lost time on the mind of the country.

Where in all the history of the world has there been a more proscriptive, hungry, and voracious party than that which is heard from now in these obituary notices of those who are about to die? [Laughter.] With nearly one hundred thousand offices to fill and more created from time to time to appease the hungry, gaping mouths of the crowds that have come around this Capitol, it has been impossible for me to listen to this appeal with entire patience and composure. I did not intend to utter a single word; but this attempt to insnare the public mind into the belief that some injury is being done, some outrage committed which the Senators over there themselves would not do under like circumstances, is a little too much for human endurance. In the last eighteen years what have we seen? Droves, gangs, brigades, and squadrons of office-seekers coming here; and when the limit was exhausted by the number of offices all being filled, we have seen more created from time to time to satisfy the demand for them.

I did not want to say this. I had hoped there would be no debate on this question and that we would proceed to do our duty in order, as we intend to do and as the country expected us to do, and fill these places with men whose political principles are in harmony with the majority on this side, and for whose official conduct we have to be responsible before the country.

I shall part from every outgoing official here with nothing but kindness, good wishes, and a hope for his prosperity during life in the future; but who does not know the diversities, the vicissitudes of political fortune? Who does not know that the heart of my excellent friend, the present Secretary, would have been rejoiced if, through his indefatigable efforts in raising money and in every other way, my term should have been limited to the 4th of last March? Who does not know how gladly he would have hailed my defeat in the hard-fought battle of last year in Indiana? I blame him not at all. I wish him well here and elsewhere. So with our Sergeant-at-Arms. But this is one of the changes of political life that come some time to us all. Some of us are here to-day and may be gone to-morrow. I have seen men go out from this body from the great position of Senator itself within the last few days, with deep regret and sorrow on my part, sorrow to part from them and because they sorrowed over it themselves; but this is the fate of political warfare, and the fewer lamentations now and the fewer unnecessary tears that are shed on the other side of the Chamber on the subject, the better will the American people like the Senate. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the Senator from Maine proceeds, the Chair will state to persons occupying the galleries that any manifestation of approval or disapproval of the proceedings of the Senate is contrary to the rules of the Senate, and the doorkeepers are directed to take into custody any persons thus transgressing.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] has spoken a good deal of truth, and I only rise to say that my lamentation is not over the outgoing officers of the Senate; my lamentation is over the great defection of the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who has for all the years I have known his public service read to us such homilies and such adjurations and such lectures and such exhortations in behalf of a reformed and a refined civil service. I supposed that he would stand firm and that in this department of the service of the United States, which never yet has been overcome by the wave of partisanship, he certainly would be the last to surrender. I ask the honorable Senator what can we tie our confidence to in regard to his future course in any other department of office-giving and office-getting and office-hunting, if here, where partisanship has never ruled before, he makes specious pleas and specious arguments in behalf of removal now. The defection is a great and severe and sore blow to reform.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, only a word or two. I am in favor of making the changes proposed. I know my friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] feels badly about it, and I will send for some soothing sirup for him before I get through. [Laughter.] I am not in favor of turning out, to use a Saxon expression, every republican employé of the Senate. I shall not be found so acting. There are old servants here who ought to be kept here, and who, I hope, will be kept here and die here; but we have certain great offices, Sergeant-at-Arms, Secretary of the Senate, Chief Clerk, principal Executive Clerk. It might be inferred from what was said by the Senator from New York that it was proposed to remove the Doorkeeper. Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper is but one office, and not two, as I am assured, under our rules, and to be voted for as one office. That is the title of the officer.

I am in favor of making these changes, not because I have not been properly treated in every respect by these gentlemen in the most kindly manner always; and for them I entertain very high respect and regard, and they know it; but this thing is to be done because it is the right thing to be done.

Let me read what my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] did not emphasize. Here is this document which he read, signed by my friend the Secretary. I advise him as soon as possible to commence suit against the man who forged his name to this document and demand as many thousand dollars damages as he pleases, and let him employ my friend, the Senator from New York, as his counsel, and if it is false he will recover. What is it?

Foremost among their schemes—

The Secretary says—

Foremost among their schemes, the opposition already announce their intention to attempt the revolutionary expulsion of the President from his office.

Is that true? I have not any very high regard or respect for the man who occupies the presidential chair; I think that he is there through fraud; that he has no business there; that a majority of three hundred thousand freemen in this country said he had no business there; and when the secretary of this association says that "foremost among their schemes the opposition already announce their intention to attempt the revolutionary expulsion of the President from his office," I denounce it as false. I as a democrat say it is not true. There has been no such intention. No respectable body of men, either in point of intellect or numbers, has ever said such a thing. Therefore I say that if it was not absolutely right and proper, for other reasons, to make the change in the Secretaryship of the Senate, I would make the change because of that circular, unless it was denied and proved to be false.

However, we are told that this is horrible proscription; that this republican party has never undertaken to do a thing of this character. Why, sir, in the great State so honorably represented upon this floor in part by my distinguished friend who sits before me [Mr. CONKLING] the two great political parties have always said that the judiciary should not be spotted by politics. In the little State that I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor—and my colleague, I know, will agree with me in what I state—the two great parties have always kept the judiciary as nearly equal as possible.

Mr. CONKLING. I never heard of it in New York.

Mr. EATON. Then I am mistaken, and can only say that you ought to have heard of it before in New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend will allow me to say that if it were true, I ought to have heard of it. But shall I understand the honorable Senator to say that the democratic party in New York have made non-partisan nominations for judicial offices and kept the elective judiciary out of partisan politics?

Mr. EATON. I have been informed, and having been so informed believe, that not only the democratic party but the republican party of New York have together joined in order to keep the judiciary out of partisan politics.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will pardon me one moment——

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I say that the republican party would join anybody who ought to be joined in doing anything that is right, I believe; but that the republican party has ever had the opportunity to join the democratic party in electing non-partisan judicial officers, I never heard of before. I know that it has happened in a particular district here or there, which was clearly, undoubtedly one way or the other in politics, that one party or the other has failed to make an adverse nomination, and has sometimes in form nominated perhaps the very person nominated on the other side. But that in any contestable district where the democrats could elect or could hope to elect, or that in the State of New York the democratic party has ever been in favor of a non-partisan judiciary, I ought to know if it be true; but I do not know it, because no such thing is true.

Mr. EATON. Doubtless I am wrong to a certain extent.

Mr. KERNAN. My friend from Connecticut will allow me to suggest that he may have learned this: in establishing our court of appeals of seven judges by a constitutional amendment, there was a provision put in, with a view to start it not all one way, that no elector should vote for more than five. That would make and did make five of one party and two of the other elected for that time; but I will say that there is no provision when one drops out hereafter to prevent those elected from being all of one party, which is a defect. Probably that is what my friend from Connecticut may have had in his mind.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend from Connecticut will allow me one moment, my colleague is quite right in so far as he confines himself to the record. It was intended that neither party should have the whole of the court of appeals to begin with; but my colleague said, inadvertently I presume, that the intention was that one party should have five and the other party should have two judges.

Mr. KERNAN. I said the intent probably being to start the court with five of one party and two of the other, which was accomplished.

Mr. CONKLING. There my colleague falls into an error, as I submit to him. The intention was to prevent either party from having more than five and either party from having less than two; but it was not the intention to establish in advance that one party should have five and the other should have but two. That is all the criticism to which I meant to call his attention; and now that being the provision, what ensued? My friend from Connecticut will pardon me for one instant for trespassing upon his time. The democratic party proceeded to nominate just as it is going to-day to proceed to nominate, all the officers which it has the power in numbers to obtain, and it did obtain them, the whole five; the republican party obtained but two; and when this preliminary provision had expended itself that was the end of it. It was like an advertisement that you sometimes see of some public amusement, "positively for one time only." This was positively only for that time, and just as soon as the bar was broken down the democratic party said to the judiciary, as of everything else, "Moab is my wash-pot; over Edom will I cast out my shoe." They took everything and reduced it to what my friend from Connecticut would call an absolute possessio pedis.

Mr. EATON. It seems that to a certain extent I was mistaken in regard to New York. I regret that I was mistaken.

Mr. CONKLING. So do I.

Mr. EATON. I am glad that the Senator does. I regret that I was mistaken; but that I was entirely right in regard to my own State is absolutely true. Now, then, let us look at what this party have done, represented on this floor by gentlemen who find fault to-day because the Secretary of the Senate is to be changed. How have they voted here in the last twelve years? Who have been confirmed as judges of the Supreme Court of the United States by these very honorable gentlemen, a part of them? What democrat has been nominated to occupy a position upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States? With a majority of three hundred thousand of the voters of this country, what democrat has been nominated to take a seat upon the great judicial bench of the United States? Not one.

Mr. BLAINE. Judge Field.

Mr. EATON. Not one. There are two there, Judge Field and Judge Clifford——

Mr. BLAINE. And Judge Field was put there by Mr. Lincoln.

Mr. EATON. I understand that he was put there by Mr. Lincoln, and I understand further enough to say that no democrat, as a democrat, has ever been nominated by the President of the United States for seventeen years and confirmed by the Senate. Why did not my friend from New York lift up his hand in holy horror and speak with his eloquent tongue to the effect that some good democrat ought to be upon the bench of the Supreme Court? Why did not he, all powerful as he was, not with this but with another Administration, recommend the nomination of gentlemen of that character to take seats upon the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States? Was that cry heard when Mr. Hunt and Mr. Harlan were nominated a little while ago. For Mr. Harlan, of Kentucky, from the State of my friend here, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] I had the pleasure of voting myself. I ought not, perhaps, to say that I had.

Mr. CONKLING. What do you find fault about, then?

Mr. EATON. Because other folks ought to have thought at that time with regard to judges of the Supreme Court what they think now when we take a little office from their grasp. If it were anywhere else except here, and perhaps I might just as well say it here as anywhere else, the whole of this business is playing baby. A great party have come into power. We are responsible and able to be responsible for the carrying on of the legislation of forty or fifty million people, and we intend to do it with our own servants. That is the way to tell it and to talk it. We propose to elect our own officers. We do not propose to remove all these people, not everybody here. I can name a dozen men, sound, stalwart republicans, whom I desire to have remain in their offices, but not these gentlemen; and I know none of them will bear me any ill-will for what I say. It is no clean sweep, to use an Anglo-Saxon term, but we propose to take the heads off three or four of these gentlemen and put democratic heads upon their shoulders.

Mr. CONKLING. They might as well have none at all.

Mr. EATON. My friend from New York says they might as well have no heads at all. [Laughter.] That was a witticism by my friend from New York that the galleries did not hear, and therefore I thought I would give him the benefit of it. [Laughter.] Mr. President, within six months from to-day my friend will get up and in sackcloth and ashes he will say, "I was mistaken in the men you have elected; they are the best officers the Senate has seen in half a century."

But, Mr. President, I did not intend to say half so much. I only wanted to say that this great party, who holds in its hands one hundred thousand or one hundred and twenty thousand offices, ought not to complain because of the loss of two or three officers; and it is not worthy of the republican party of the Senate or the country to complain.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, there is one thing the honorable Senator from Connecticut said which I think ought not to go without answer and correction. I will remark here in passing that all the pretext, if the Senator will not take that as an offensive word——

Mr. EATON. Oh, no.

Mr. BLAINE. Of removing the Secretary of the Senate because he issued the circular which has been read, or because he was the secretary of the republican committee that issued it, may go for what it is worth. My honorable friend knows and I know that is not the cause. If he had never issued a circular, if he had never been secretary of the committee, he would have to go all the same.

But the honorable Senator says that the secretary of the republican national committee asserted what was not true when he stated that it was the design of the democratic party to remove the President. As to the last Congress, I may speak freely of what took place in the House; that is historical. I am debarred by the rules from speaking of the present House. I assert here that the struggle which was going on inside the democratic party of both branches of Congress, and which finally culminated by appointing the Potter committee in the interest of the ring, so to speak, who were going for blood, to quote their own phrase, meant at that time to assault the title of the President if they could find evidence on which to ground their charges. I undertake to say that my friend on the 17th of May, in the Senate of the United States, would not have risen here and denied that it was the intention to remove the President if they could prove fraud. They sent out their committee, and as the boys say about the fishermen, they made a water-haul. They made themselves ridiculous. They did not find evidence on which to ground and base an indictment; and now with an immense parade of virtue the Senator from Connecticut comes to the point and declares that it is false that any such design was ever entertained.

Mr. McMILLAN. What is the date of that circular?

Mr. BLAINE. The 27th day of May, 1878.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EATON. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. BLAINE. The Secretary of the Senate, then acting as secretary of the national republican committee, stated with accuracy and precision what was the impending fear in the public mind at that time. I never saw it contradicted. I never heard it contradicted on this floor, and I never heard of its being contradicted on the floor of the other House of Congress. It is a magnificent parade of virtue to come in at this late day and justify the removal of the Secretary of the Senate because in a circular signed by him the precise truth was told about the revolutionary designs of the democratic party at that time, which designs were not carried out because they made a perfect fiasco and became ridiculous in the eyes of their own party and a stench in the nostrils of a loyal people.

Mr. WALLACE. Does not the Senator from Maine know that within a week preceding the date of that circular the democratic convention of the State of Pennsylvania, second in size in the Union, expressly resolved that it was unwise and impolitic to make any attack whatever upon the title of the President? That was the only democratic convention that was held near the date of that circular.

Mr. BLAINE. If my friend will pardon me, why did the State of Pennsylvania, so skillfully manipulated and so artfully handled by the honorable Senator himself, adopt that resolve if there was not some danger in the air?

Mr. WALLACE. Because the assertion made in that document was false and demanded contradiction.

Mr. BLAINE. But the document had never seen the light of day then. The honorable Senator cannot base it on that document. That document never came out until some sneaking Federal office-holder betrayed its possession, and he is probably waiting around here in the corridors now for some reward for betraying the secrets of his party. The Senator cannot base the action of Pennsylvania on that. The Senator knows that the whole country was agitated with what was considered a revolutionary movement in the House of Representatives, and he went up to Harrisburgh to make it certain that no such rash step should be taken by the democracy of Pennsylvania if he could help it. He did help it; and that is all there is of that.

Mr. WALLACE. That there was such an agitation in the country I concede; but that it was the action of men who declared what was untrue I also assert; and it found public vent in this document first. It was the assertion of men based upon nothing but their own opinion and their own desire to make public that which was not correct and which was not sustained by a single word of any public man who was worthy to be called a leader either in the State of the Senator from Maine, or in my State, or in any other State in the Union, or in the lower House of Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. I think this is an immense exhibition of virtue after the fact. If there was anything current at that time, if there was anything admitted here and there and everywhere, it was that the Potter committee was organized to fish for testimony on which some proceeding might be started and inaugurated and carried through.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to say to my friend that, probably he will remember the date but my recollection is contemporaneous, or about that, with the organization of the Potter committee there was passed by the House a resolution that there was no intent to question the title of the President. That was done contemporaneously.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no; some weeks afterward; very nearly the close of the session.

Mr. KERNAN. No.

Mr. BLAINE. It was done after there had come up an indignant protest from the country. After the business communities everywhere discountenanced and protested against any such thing, then the House of Representatives, with an aroused public opinion influencing them, on a motion of a republican member, did adopt a resolution that it was not the intention to initiate proceedings looking to the displacement of the President.

Mr. KERNAN. I yield to my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I still assert what I said before, that this part of the circular which I read was false, and not true. In the first place, on the floor of the Senate, who ever uttered any language of this character? This circular assails the whole party of the country, not only the Senate, not only the House of Representatives, but the democracy of the entire country everywhere.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. EATON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. It is still echoing in my ear that the Senator from Connecticut himself denounced the title of the President here to-day as a fraud.

Mr. EATON. I say so now.

Mr. BLAINE. He maintained that the President holds his title by fraud.

Mr. EATON. I say so now.

Mr. BLAINE. Then is not the Senator denouncing the entire republican party, which is answerable for it?

Mr. EATON. I say so again.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; then do not let the Senator upbraid the republican party for saying the same in return.

Mr. EATON. No, not the whole republican party, for a great many of them feel just the same as I do about it. The best of them feel just as I do on the subject. I do not undertake to say whether the Senator from Maine does or not; he is able to speak for himself; but the best of them agree with me that the man at the White House has no legal title to his office as President of the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator wants an answer I will give him what my view is. My view is that the President of the United States who holds the office to-day was elected by as fair and as honest a vote as George Washington was, but that it took a singular departure from constitutional modes to make that vote good, and that he was not only entitled to the votes of three Southern States that he got but of three more of which he was defrauded by bulldozing democrats who maintained by violence what was not theirs by right. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Maine——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will suspend. The Sergeant-at-Arms will see that the doorkeepers take into custody any person violating the rules of the Senate in the galleries. The Sergeant-at-Arms is expected to see this order carried into effect. The Senator from Connecticut will proceed.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, a word to my friend from Maine. The quality of his belief is equaled only by india-rubber. He believes that the votes of those three States were legitimately for Mr. Hayes; he believes that the votes of three other Southern States should have been counted for Mr. Hayes. Sir, I cannot make any argument against the belief of the gentleman from Maine. My belief is that three hundred thousand majority of the people of the United States were defrauded out of the result of an honest election for President. But to come to the point, my friend says the House of Representatives organized the Potter committee. To do what? If I understand him, it was to find evidence, proper evidence, that this President of the United States was not properly elected.

Mr. BLAINE. And suppose they had found proper evidence that he was not elected, what were they going to do, just sit down and laugh at it?

Mr. EATON. I will not answer that.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah!

Mr. EATON. Not here, not now. I will answer it simply by reading these words:

> Foremost among their schemes the opposition already announce their intention to attempt—> the revolutionary expulsion of the President from his office.

What?

Mr. President, there the statement of facts existed. If there was proper evidence, legitimate evidence, that the acting President of the United States was not of right the President of the United States, and there was any legal means to test that question, will the Senator from Maine deny here on the floor in his place that it ought to have been tested? If so, let him say so. I do not say there is, I do not say there can be found, but if there could be found legitimate and proper evidence that the President of the United States was not properly elected President of the United States, and there was some constitutional means to remove him from his office, dare the Senator from Maine say that those means ought not to be employed? If so, I will give way to him.

Mr. BLAINE. A few moments since the honorable Senator from Connecticut said that the President held his seat by fraud. Now he says that he does not pretend to say whether that committee found any evidence or not. Do I understand the honorable Senator to make so grave a charge and not to have any evidence of it?

Mr. EATON. I have evidence sufficient for me.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah, but not sufficient to warrant your action in the Senate.

Mr. EATON. Perhaps not.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, I will give the honorable Senator my answer, and very decidedly, and without the slightest hesitation. My answer is, that the electoral commission, which he did not vote for, and which I did not vote for——

Mr. EATON. We agreed about that.

Mr. BLAINE. I well remember the bright sunrise when the Senator from Connecticut and myself walked out by the east front at seven a. m. when the bill was passed. We were in a very small minority. He remarked to me that at all events it was a record on which he would venture to stand for the future. I stood with him on that. We agree so well on general political questions that it was no wonder we agreed then. [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. I only wonder that we do not agree now. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. I say that the judgment of the electoral commission was a final and conclusive rendering of the presidential issue, just as much as the orderly counting of the electoral votes hitherto by the Vice-President in the presence of the two Houses. It was intended to be so; it was so under the law. The American people accepted it as such; and it was an unpatriotic course on the part of the democratic party to seek to disturb that settlement. I do not mean it in any offensive sense, but it was not an honorable course for the democratic party. They had agreed to a tribunal constituted after their own desires, and when that tribunal had decided against them they sought around by every possible means to see if they could not escape from its verdict; and failing to escape from its verdict they come in as the honorable Senator from Connecticut does to-day, and cry that it is a fraud. It is not in my judgment an honorable compliance with the terms of a settlement to which the whole American people were parties. Of course I do not use the phrase in a sense personally offensive to the honorable Senator.

Mr. EATON. The term "honorable" is used rather flippantly by my friend from Maine. When he alludes to me personally——

Mr. BLAINE. I do not.

Mr. EATON. I pursue my own course, I follow my own convictions to their legitimate conclusions always. My friend spoke of the House of Representatives of the United States. What did they say? This circular was written or printed on the 27th day of May, 1878. On the 14th day of June, 1878, a resolution was passed by the House——

Mr. BLAINE. Three weeks afterward, mark.

Mr. EATON. Yes, I do mark.

Mr. KERNAN. It had been under discussion all the same.

Mr. EATON. It had been under discussion a long time in the House, and nobody knows it better than my friend from Maine. The resolution is in these words:

Resolved, That no subsequent Congress and neither House has jurisdiction to reverse the action at such joint meeting; and any attempt by either House to annul or disregard such action, or the title to office arising therefrom, would be revolutionary, and is disapproved by the House.

I would not have voted for that if I had been there.

Mr. ALLISON. What was the vote?

Mr. EATON. The vote was 216 yeas, 21 nays; and 54 not voting, among which doubtless I might have been found. The assertion, not to say the argument, of my friend from Maine that any body of men, that any coterie of democrats in this country anywhere desired the revolutionary expulsion of the President from his office, I assert is false. I assert as a democrat that it is not true. Let it come from where it may come, it is false. If there had been legitimate and legal power to unseat the President of the United States, if a good case had been established, that is one thing; but no man, no Senator, can tell me that that would be revolutionary. It is not true. So much for that. Sir, the democrats of the Senate will go on here and do their duty in this matter. Their duty is, in my judgment, to take three or four of these important offices, because they are necessary for the proper managing of the business of the Senate, but I hope and trust that the majority of my own party will be found not to make an indiscriminate slaughter of faithful old servants.

Mr. BLAINE. A single word, Mr. President. All that I said is entirely vindicated by the record read by the Senator from Connecticut, every word of it. Several weeks after the Potter committee was organized and the movement initiated, and after the Senator from Pennsylvania had got his State convention to denounce it, and after various forms of public opinion had come up from various portions or all portions of the country, then it was that the resolution which the honorable Senator from Connecticut has read was passed by the House. I beg that Senator's attention to this fact, that the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in a carefully prepared opinion—I believe a written opinion, written by a competent gentleman skilled in parliamentary law—decided the Potter resolution to be in order because it involved the title to the Presidency of the United States. The whole scope and purport and aim and object of the resolution contemplated that and contemplated nothing else. And my honorable friend from Connecticut knows it very well, for he is a man of affairs; he is an earnest man. He never contemplated, the House of Representatives never contemplated, nobody ever contemplated that the Potter committee were going to gather a lot of evidence just to have it printed and looked at. They "meant business," as the cant phrase is. They started with that end in view. They had a purpose and an object; and all that happened was that the facts did not justify the conclusion they thought they would reach, and they backed out from it, with what grace it does not become me to say.

I rose only to say that the idea of visiting the Secretary of the Senate, who happened to be secretary of the national republican committee, with special censure because he put in a circular at that time what was the general and universal belief in the republican party is something which the Senator from Connecticut ought to withdraw as an unjust reflection upon that officer.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. BLAINE. I will yield.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. BLAINE. Go on.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I thought the Senator was through. I did not intend to interrupt him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Maine to say he had concluded.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. EATON. Will my friend give way one moment? I want to say one word. I am a little surprised, I confess, at the language which the Senator from Maine sees fit to adopt. He now goes off on this assertion, if I understand him: he says that on the 27th day of May, 1878, the whole republican party—I use his own words—believed the opposition, that is to say the democratic party, "already announce their intention to attempt the revolutionary expulsion of the President."

Mr. BLAINE. And the passage of the resolution for the Potter committee was taken as that announcement by the country.

Mr. EATON. I ask the Senator from Maine if, in his place in the Senate under his obligations which he owes to the people of this country as a Senator, he says that all of the republican party of the United States on the 27th day of May, 1878, believed that the democratic party intended to adopt revolutionary measures to expel the President from his office? I beg to ask him if under his responsibility as a Senator he makes an assertion of that character, that the whole republican party, including all his brethren here, all my friends on the other side, believed that I or that my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] or my friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] or my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] or my friend from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS,] or my friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] was engaged in a revolutionary plan to expel the President from his office?

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator ask for an answer?

Mr. EATON. I do ask for an answer.

Mr. BLAINE. I have already given it but I can repeat it. My answer is this: when I say the whole republican party, that comprises four or five million voters—and of course I cannot speak for every one of them—I mean the general belief among the republican party at that time was and is to-day, and so far as I know before the honorable Senator from Connecticut had spoken I would have said also among the democratic party was that if the Potter committee could find evidence on which to ground some sort of proceeding to oust the President, they would have done it. And I believe, and have no hesitation on my responsibility as a Senator or any other responsibility I can assume in saying, that in my judgment any proceeding of that kind, I do not care what form you put it in, in view of the settlement that was made by the electoral commission, would be revolutionary. Therefore I repeat that the judgment of the republican party throughout the country and my personal judgment then was, and now is, that it was the intention of the democratic party, if they could find evidence enough to ground it on, to initiate a proceeding which in its very nature was revolutionary and which could not be anything else. That is my answer to the honorable Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EATON. That is altogether another matter.

Mr. BLAINE. It is exactly the other side of the same matter.

Mr. EATON. It is altogether another matter.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I decline to yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCDONALD. I should like my friend from Georgia to allow me to ask the Senator from Maine——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not yield. My friend will excuse me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. HILL of Georgia. I do not know when that colloquy will end, and with all due deference and kindness to my friends on both sides I will not yield further.

Mr. President, there is an issue of fact raised here between the Senators who have addressed the Senate, and a very material issue of fact, one affecting not only the character of the democratic party very materially, but affecting somewhat the character of American institutions, in my judgment, and it is very important that the real truth should be settled upon this question. The Senator from Connecticut has read from what purports to be some sort of a circular, I do not know what, issued by the Secretary of this body in May, 1878, in which it is stated that the whole democratic party, or what he is pleased to call the opposition party, "announce their intention to attempt the revolutionary expulsion of the President from his office." The word "revolutionary" is used. The Senator from Connecticut has denounced those words as false and asserted it in no measured terms. The Senator from Maine comes to the vindication of the circular and charges that there was a revolutionary purpose, revolutionary not only on the part of the democratic party or a large portion of them, but to sustain his general charge he is satisfied that the Potter resolution had that purpose in view. Now, sir, I say that the Senator from Maine is as incorrect in his statement as was the circular of the Secretary of this body when it was written, and I say that the Senator cannot produce a single fact from any authorized portion of the democratic party to justify his assertion. What he may quote from individual expressions I do not know; what he may quote from violent newspapers I cannot tell; but I affirm here now in this presence that he is not justified in saying that any portion of the democratic party ever intended under any contingency a revolutionary movement for the expulsion of the President, and he cannot produce the proceedings of a single convention, or the utterance of a single reputable leader of the democratic party in Congress or out of it, to justify his most remarkable and hazardous assertion.

Now, sir, I think I have a right to know something of the small divisions that existed in the democratic party on that subject, and I will state them very briefly. When the electoral commission bill was passed it contained this provision, to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate:

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be held to impair or affect any right now existing under the Constitution and laws, to question, by proceeding in the judicial courts of the United States, the right or title of the person who shall be declared elected, or who shall claim to be President or Vice-President of the United States, if any such right exists.

That, I say, is a provision of the act of Congress which established the electoral commission. I need not remind the Senate and the country that the provision was inserted because of the belief of some that if the electoral commission should do what was apprehended they would do, refuse to look into the issue as to who was elected President on the merits, should refuse to investigate the broad charge as to Louisiana and Florida, and the result of that commission should be the declaration of either gentleman as President of the United States without looking into the testimony, without meeting any issue on the real merits because of the jurisdiction of that tribunal, because of the constitutional form in which that issue was raised, the door should not be closed to a proper judicial investigation which would bring out all the facts and a final decision by the judicial tribunals of the country.

That there was ground for this belief that the courts of the country would have jurisdiction to investigate this question is manifest from the fact that learned gentlemen and distinguished statesmen on both sides of the Chamber, and on both sides of the other Chamber, including some of the most distinguished men of both parties, incorporated a provision in the electoral act itself reserving all right to reopen the question and have it investigated before the judicial tribunals of the country.

Now, sir, here is the truth. Some of the ablest lawyers in the United States believed that by proper proceeding the Supreme Court could get jurisdiction fairly, judicially to investigate and determine this question. It was upon that conviction, I remember distinctly, that the Legislature of Maryland passed a memorial to Congress and instructed its attorney-general to bring it here, and it was presented in the House of Representatives, demanding that proceedings of this character should be inaugurated, and there were quite a number of gentlemen, and I will say they were not all democrats, for I happen to know that some of the most distinguished republican lawyers of the United States held that it would be perfectly competent in a proper proceeding for the Supreme Court of the United States to reopen, investigate, and determine the question upon its merits, for mark you, it had not been determined on its merits by the electoral commission.

Every gentleman with whom I am acquainted, every prominent democrat in the United States who desired to investigate this question at all, desired to do so through the courts and under the encouragement and authority given by the electoral commission act itself. Was that revolutionary? Did that show a revolutionary purpose? Whether that proceeding before the courts should be inaugurated or not, would depend upon the evidence, the legitimate evidence that might be ascertained in the case. Therefore it was that all sections of the democratic party were perfectly willing to inaugurate an investigation by the House of Representatives to ascertain the real facts; and there were democrats in this country, and I say there were republicans in this country who, if the facts should develop an illegal title and it should be held that the Supreme Court had jurisdiction to review and investigate that title, were in favor of the movement. Was that revolutionary? Will any gentleman say that a purpose to test the question before the courts, when the right so to test it had been held out to them in the very act organizing the electoral commission—will any gentleman rise in his place and say that was revolutionary?

Not only was that a provision in the act, but the distinguished gentleman who occupies the chair at this moment, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] one of the best lawyers in the republican party, accompanied that bill with a report to Congress, and in that report he said:

Fourth. It is provided that the act shall not affect, either way, the question of right of resort to the judicial courts of the United States by the persons concerned as claimants to the offices in question.

So I say here by the report of the distinguished gentleman, himself one of the leaders of the republican party, made by him—a report agreed to by the leading democrats and leading republicans alike—the right to test the question of the validity of the presidential election before the courts was held out to the country as a reason why the method of settlement provided by the electoral commission act should be adopted.

I confess, so far as I am concerned, that I am one of those gentlemen who believed that the courts had no jurisdiction. I confess I was not deceived by that report nor deceived by that section of the electoral commission bill. My own judgment was that under the Constitution of the country the determination as to who was President of the United States by the election of 1876 was vested in the two Houses of Congress, and that when those two Houses pronounced their judgment, by whatever methods they reached that judgment, that judgment was final and conclusive. That was my own opinion; but abler lawyers than I am, both republicans and democrats, held to a contrary opinion, and this contrary opinion was encouraged, I repeat, both by the report made by the able lawyer appointed to draft the electoral commission bill and by a provision in the electoral commission bill itself. Therefore, from the very time that the two Houses of Congress settled this memorable controversy with the aid of the electoral commission, and declared Mr. Hayes elected President of the United States, a large portion of very estimable gentlemen in this country, North and South, men of high character as lawyers, desired to have the question investigated before the courts of the country. As to what should be the form of proceeding was a difficult question. In my own judgment as a lawyer there was no form of proceeding because I did not think it was a case that could be made.

That was my own judgment, but others differed with me, and that was the only controversy in the democratic party. A large portion of the party were opposed even to taking this proceeding before the courts. A small portion desired to take the course Maryland desired to take. Twenty-one democrats who voted on the Potter resolution or on the resolution following the report on this memorial from Maryland—twenty-one I believe voted against the Maryland report, but perhaps it was fourteen. Some say it was fourteen; I do not remember the precise number; at least fourteen thought the case ought to be opened. A great number thought the courts could not be opened, and the only proper plan was to let the matter die. So far as making an issue was concerned, so far as any attempt to affect the presidential title was concerned, the large majority of the democratic party in Congress and out of it was opposed to making any movement whatever to disturb the presidential title. A strong minority of eloquent gentlemen, able lawyers, aided and abetted by distinguished members of the republican party, did desire to inaugurate a movement before the courts for the purpose of testing the validity of that title. And yet we are told this was revolutionary. Here was a revolutionary purpose, and the Secretary of the Senate of the United States issued this circular denouncing this as revolutionary, and it is one of the most remarkable facts of this most remarkable history touching this whole presidential imbroglio of 1876 that notwithstanding the report made by the electoral commission committee, and notwithstanding section 6 in the electoral commission act, just as soon as the decision was rendered declaring Mr. Hayes President, and the intimation was given out in any way by anybody that there was a purpose by any person to inaugurate a movement before the courts to test the validity of his title, the republicans, with remarkable unanimity, raised the cry, "You are going to revolutionize this country! Another revolution!"

They had refused to look into the facts in the electoral commission; they had pronounced that ever memorable decision which declares that not only individuals but the Congress of the United States were bound to believe as true what everybody knew was a perjury, were bound to accept as genuine what everybody knew was a forgery, were bound to declare and carry out as constitutional and right what everybody knew was an unmitigated fraud; and just as soon as that decision was procured by a refusal to look into the facts, and some gentlemen desired that the facts should be looked into and investigated by a judicial tribunal in a judicial manner and by a judicial proceeding, the gentlemen on the other side raised the cry of "revolution." Is it revolution to go before the courts? Why, sir, suppose these proceedings had been inaugurated either in the name of a defeated candidate or in the name of a disappointed State, a sovereign State, who was a party to that wrong, a party damaged by that wrong—suppose these proceedings had been inaugurated by the State of Maryland or in any other way, if the courts had not jurisdiction to pass upon it the courts would have decided so. And the court that it was desired to go before was not a democratic court; the court proposed to test the question before was the Supreme Court of the United States, a court which has upon it seven republican judges and only two democrats; and because some democrats in this country believed that the courts did have jurisdiction to test this question, and that the question ought to be brought before them so that it might be tested, and because they were encouraged so to believe by the very section 6 of the electoral commission bill, and by the report of the committee which reported that bill, and notwithstanding the fact that they were willing to select a republican court before which to test the question, yet in the face of all these facts the air has been absolutely full with the miserable partisan cry that the democratic party were going into revolution. And at this late day a distinguished Senator from New England gets up and reiterates before this body that the democratic party, or a large proportion of it, intended a revolutionary purpose. Certainly he can point to no record, he has pointed to none. It would seem that one party had been so accustomed to disregard proper judicial proceedings that they regard any party proposing a judicial investigation as guilty of a revolutionary purpose.

That is the point I make. I say that that circular issued by the Secretary was false, utterly false. I say that the democratic party had not announced, as that circular says, any revolutionary purpose of the expulsion of the President. I say that no man can produce a proceeding of the democratic party in convention, in Legislature, or in the Congress of the United States to justify the charge that they intended revolution. The truth is, to tell the candid fact, I always believed that the gentlemen raised the cry of revolution largely to prevent the investigation, because they feared the consequences if one should be inaugurated.

Now, the Senator says if there is no danger in the air why has the House of Representatives deemed it necessary to pass a resolution disclaiming any revolutionary purpose? Why did the distinguished gentleman from New York, who introduced the resolution of inquiry in order to ascertain what the facts were which had never before been ascertained, announce in his very resolution that there was no revolutionary purpose and that every charge of that sort was false? It was because of the cry raised by gentlemen on the other side; because of the cry raised by the republican party.

The Senator from Maine says the circular issued by the Secretary had not then appeared. Well, I will guarantee now that if you will take the trouble you may look back at those times and you will find scarcely a republican paper in the United States, you will find scarcely a republican politician in the United States, I am sure you will not find a republican office-holder in the United States who was not unblushingly crying "revolution," "revolution," against the democratic party all over the country; and the cry of "revolution" was having its effect; it was deceiving a great many people; and therefore it was that the democratic party in the House felt it necessary, or proper at least, to put on record the solemn official denial of this foul slander upon their purposes.

Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss this question or any other. This is a very elaborate debate to have grown out of the simple proposition to elect a few officers of the Senate. As I am on my feet, I wish to say one word in reply to what the Senator from New York said. That Senator alluded to the fact that when he came here in July, 1861, a large number of these seats were vacant. That is a fact we all know. We had heard of that before. He alluded to the fact that they are filled now. I am gratified to say that we know that to be true. Mr. President, the saddest day in American history, in my judgment, was the one to which the Senator from New York alluded, when the South, actuated by as high and patriotic a purpose as ever actuated any people since the sun has been pursuing his course, left these Halls and attempted to secede from the Union. I grant that. They did not desire war; and I know they did what they believed was their right. They thought to make no war, they thought to engender no strife; they sought to end it; but they were mistaken, and the whole world knows the history that followed. It was a sad day when the Southern States with their gifted representatives left these Halls and left the Government in the undisputed control of the republican party; and every hour and every day from that time to this, as a consequence of that unfortunate act, the country has been rocking in the throes of revolution.

Sir, I am not here to parcel out the blame on this subject upon this section or that section, this party or that party. It was a grand mistake, a great mistake, and honestly made, unquestionably; terrible consequences have followed, consequences which did not disappoint me. But we have passed through that ordeal. We have had a reign of blood. The republican party because of that very act has had eighteen years of domination in this country. What are the fruits of that domination? History will record them; history has recorded them. I wish to say to the gentleman that as the first fact to which he alluded, contrary to the intentions of those who acted in it, inaugurated a war, long and sad, the second fact to which he alluded, the return of the South here with her proper, her fit representatives, ends the revolution which their departure began. If that departure brought war upon the country, this return assures the country of peace and prosperity once more.

The Senator may regret, the gentlemen on the other side may regret, the end of this eighteen years' lease of power. It is a thing to be regretted very much by those gentlemen. Perhaps they would like to see another secession if it would give them eighteen years of undisputed possession of this great Government. But, gentlemen, in all kindness and candor let me tell you your day is ended and your chances will not return. You did not complain of the presence of the South here when that presence was by men who had no interest with us. These, with one lingering exception, have all gone, and the places which knew them but yesterday will know them no more forever. The carpet-bag riot ends with the departure of the republican party from power.

Why are we to be constantly reminded of that act? Why should gentlemen on all occasions, in season and out of season, arraign the South for what they choose to call rebellion? Call it rebellion. History will judge that question and we should prefer the judgment of history to the judgment of the gentlemen on the other side; much prefer it. What is the purpose, unless "out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh?" It is an unpleasant thing to say; I am sure it is not meant in unkindness; it will go like a dart to many gentlemen in this hearing; yet I tell them that what the Senator from New York says is true, these seats are filled, and filled by southern representative men, and these seats will remain filled by representative southern men. That is all. Let the past, then, go. We are opposed to revolutionary purposes; we are opposed to revolutionary proceedings; we have not made anything by revolution. The republican party made eighteen years of power by revolution and they are always talking about revolution.

I hope, Mr. President, that the time has come when these perpetual sectional allusions will be abandoned. They do not tend to harmony. We are acquainted with the past history of this country quite as well as the gentlemen; we have been the chief sufferers in that past history. As for their criticism upon our future conduct, we can bear that criticism, because however unkind and unamiable it may be, it shall be our high pleasure to demonstrate in the future that there is not one word of truth in it. When you prophesy that we intend revolution, that we intend anything but the peace and good and prosperity of this whole country, it may be that you desire to find some evidence of the truth of your charges, but it is our purpose to show to the country that we are not only here, but that we are worthy to be here as were our fathers before us who did so much to make this country so great and glorious.

Mr. BLAINE. I will detain the Senate for a moment to say a word in regard to the original point of difference between myself and the Senator from Connecticut. I hold in my hand the decision of the Speaker of the House when the Potter resolution was introduced. A point of order being made that it was not a question of privilege, the Speaker ruled that it was, giving his views in an elaborate decision from which I will read only a few lines:

> A higher privilege than the one here involved and broadly and directly presented as to the rightful occupancy of the chief executive chair of the Government, and the connection of high Government officials with the frauds alleged, the Chair is unable to conceive.

This debate began with the assertion of the Senator from Connecticut that there had been no design whatever on the part of the democratic party of opening that question.

Mr. EATON. Not so; I beg pardon; no revolutionary design.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah, a revolutionary design! It has got down to a question of words.

Mr. EATON. Not so; just take what I say.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the same point taken by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. HILL.] You were going to do all you could to put one President out and another candidate in, only you object to its being called revolutionary. The Senator from Georgia objects to the late war being called a rebellion though the world looked upon it as a rebellion.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I made no such objection. I told the gentleman he could call it what he pleased.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senate understood quite well what the honorable Senator meant. I take his words at their meaning, and altogether their more pointed meaning came from the way they were put. If you mean merely to make a verbal criticism that you intended by a new law and a new investigation and an extra mode of getting this question before the courts, not in pursuance of laws which existed at the time the electoral commission acted, and that you intended by that extraordinary course never dreamed of at the time to oust the President of the United States, do not be sensitive at all if I call it revolutionary. It was clearly revolutionary, and nothing else.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Does the Senator say that proceedings in the courts to test the question were not dreamed of at the time, when that very provision is in the electoral commission act itself and repeated in the report of the committee?

Mr. BLAINE. I presume they were dreamed of under the laws as they then stood, but otherwise not.

Mr. DAWES. "If any such right exists."

Mr. BLAINE. "If any such right exists" was inserted in the bill for the electoral commission.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Did anybody ever propose to test the validity of the election of 1876 or the title of Mr. Hayes under that election by any subsequent law?

Mr. BLAINE. What did the Potter committee mean, then? Why, if you meant to resort only to judicial remedy, did you not go to the courts? You did not do any such thing. You initiated a party proceeding in the political department of the Government, and the whole Potter resolution from its preamble to its concluding word does not mention the court as the means by which a result was to be reached.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Simply because everybody who is a lawyer ought to know that the committee proceeded to get the evidence that could be used in the inauguration of proceeding in the courts. That was to determine it, so far as some portion of the democratic party was concerned; but I say the larger portion of the democratic party never had any such purpose even in the Potter resolution. They simply wanted to get the facts.

Mr. BLAINE. Then that is a new start.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. To put the facts on the record of each House, and all the gentlemen who intended any proceedings to be based upon that committee intended lawful proceedings before the courts under the laws of the land; and that is all we say; that we say was not revolutionary.

Mr. BLAINE. That is a new proceeding, that a judicial remedy was to be sought, and that as the propelling force of the whole movement a partisan committee was to be inaugurated with extraordinary power to send for persons and papers in order to work up a case. That is the judicial remedy that the honorable Senator from Georgia now presents!

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Does the Senator from Maine say that an investigation ordered by either House of Congress to ascertain facts is itself a revolutionary proceeding?

Mr. BLAINE. I say this, that an investigation ordered by a partisan vote is not the way the law contemplates the initiation of a judicial proceeding. Does the Senator think it is? If a judicial remedy was reserved in the electoral commission bill it was reserved through judicial processes; it was not reserved through scouring investigations of committees ruled over by partisan votes gathering every possible rumor and every possible falsehood without the slightest regard to any law of evidence or any protection of witnesses. Does the Senator say that that was the proceeding the electoral commission act contemplated? Does he say that as a lawyer? He is fond of putting himself forward as a lawyer.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Georgia says no such thing.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to know what the Senator does say.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Georgia is incapable of saying what the language of the Senator from Maine seems to desire him to say; but the Senator from Georgia says this: that by the provisions of the electoral commission act itself the right to proceed in the courts was reserved to either party disappointed by the result of that proceeding. Very well, that was the right. In what method that right should be asserted was another question, but it could not be asserted without evidence.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the honorable Senator mean——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let me get through. Now, then, one method of getting the evidence was that suggested by that portion of the democracy who were in favor of proceeding. I repeat again that was not the purpose of the great majority, but it was designed by some in ordering this investigation, I dare say as the Maryland memorial shows, as the report on that memorial shows, it was designed by those who believed the courts had jurisdiction to seek to get the evidence. Very well. It was designed by the great majority, however, to get the evidence because it was desired to put the facts on record officially. But here is the point I wish to make: the methed of getting the evidence is not settled by the law; any method to ascertain the evidence in a legal way is proper, and there are various ways of ascertaining facts.

Now, then, the Senator having charged that the purpose was revolutionary and now having located the revolutionary purpose on the committee and the manner of getting the evidence by the Potter committee, I put the question again, but the Senator does not answer. Does he say that the appointment of a committee by either House of Congress clothed with legal authority to make legal investigation is a revolutionary proceeding?

Mr. BLAINE. One moment. I now meet the Senator by quoting the decision of the Speaker of the House, a very competent authority who states that the resolution offered by Mr. POTTER "involved the rightful occupancy of the presidential chair." The Senator will pardon me for asking him the same question. Does the Senator hold that evidence obtained by the Potter committee was obtained to be legally used in a judicial proceeding before the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, the Senator from Georgia says no such thing.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, then, what was the motive? How could the Senator then connect—I want him here now to tell me how he connects the mission of the Potter committee with any possible proceeding that was reserved in the electoral commission bill to be taken judicially? The movement being entirely outside of anything that was reserved in the electoral commission bill, it was, in my judgment, grossly and absolutely revolutionary from beginning to end.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, I want to make a bargain with the Senator from Maine, by the permission of that Senator. I have asked him a question twice, which he has not answered.

Mr. BLAINE. I will try to answer——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let me get through. Instead of answering my question, which was a very plain one, the Senator refuses to answer it and asks me a question. Now, as my question is first in order, if the Senator will make a manly, frank answer to my question I will answer his. My question is this: You are charging a revolutionary purpose upon the democratic party here. That is the issue. You say that revolutionary purpose was manifested by the appointment of the Potter committee. Now, I ask the question: Does the Senator hold that the appointment of a committee by either House of Congress to make an investigation under their authority is a revolutionary movement? If he will answer that question squarely, I will answer his.

Mr. BLAINE. I certainly answered it once. I say that the resolution appointing the Potter committee, as construed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, did aim at a revolutionary process.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. You do not answer the question. Do you say that an investigation by the authority of either House is a revolutionary movement?

Mr. BLAINE. What does the Senator want me to answer? I certainly say that the investigation as ordered by the House and as construed by the Speaker of the House did aim at a revolutionary process.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Is the appointment of a committee by either House to make an investigation a revolutionary movement?

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, well, the Senator must not be childish, if he will pardon the phrase.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. And if so, did the Senator from Maine mean revolution when he moved the appointment of the Teller committee?

Mr. BLAINE. No, he meant to find out those who were trying revolution in the South against peace and law and order.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. And we meant to find out the facts in regard to those who stole the Presidency.

Mr. BLAINE. I have the floor. I am very liberal with the floor, and I am willing to answer questions that have the slightest pertinence.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will answer the Senator's question with great pleasure, for I like to answer his questions.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish very briefly to sum up this case. The judicial remedy reserved in the electoral commission was, if any wrong existed there might be a judicial remedy. That contemplated nothing in the world but a judicial remedy before the courts——

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, rose.

Mr. BLAINE. Wait a moment; I have the floor. It contemplated nothing in the world but a judicial remedy before the courts of the United States. Neither the democratic party nor any of its agents, nor any of the counsel of Mr. Tilden, ever ventured to make any use of that remedy, but they initiated one wholly outside of it, that had no lawful or legal connection with it.

Therefore I maintain, to bring back the debate where it began, that the Secretary of this Senate, who was the secretary of the national republican committee, expressed what was the general judgment of the people of the United States outside of the partisan ranks of the democracy when he said that it was a revolutionary design. I say more than that, that on the 13th of May, when this movement was inaugurated, the democracy felt in very high feather in regard to it. They thought great fruits were coming from it; they had some very startling witnesses in reserve. They had been coaching them and herding them, and the country was to be treated to great surprises, to enormous developments of fraud. The thing did not turn out quite as well as they expected; it rather missed fire; the reaction set in; and four weeks after the party which had unanimously set out on this crusade against the occupant of the executive chair, decided by the Speaker of the House to be a resolution which aimed at the occupancy of the chair, the very same party came back, if I may use the phrase, with its tail between its legs, and with an almost unanimous vote in the House of Representatives they resolved that on the whole they did not mean any such thing. That is the history of the proceeding from its mischievous inception to its ridiculous conclusion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.] Is the Senate ready for the question? The motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is that the Senate now proceed to the election of a Secretary of the Senate, a Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate, a Chief Clerk, a principal Executive Clerk, and a Chaplain. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That John C. Burch be, and he is hereby, elected Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should like to record a vote in favor of the present competent, faithful and accomplished Secretary of the Senate. I think every other republican Senator would like to do so too. I should have hoped a few hours ago that Senators not republicans, some of them at least, would be glad to do so. I was not prepared for all now foreshadowed. I supposed there were Senators not republicans who understood purity, efficiency and honesty in the civil service to mean what I understand it to mean. I suppose the honest rule to be to select not a scoundrel but an honest man, not a fool but a man who is competent, not a pretender or sniveler but a man of sincerity for a subordinate public position, and when you have him there and he does his duty to keep him there—not to turn him out for even another good man.

That, I will say to the honorable Senator from Delaware, who was good enough to refer to me some time ago as a non-believer in his notions of purity in the civil service, is what I understand by efficiency, purity and integrity in the administration of the public service—to find a man who is honest, who is competent, who is attentive, and when you have found him to keep him, and not to drive him out in order to put some favorite or claimant in his place.

Some hours ago I might have hoped that others besides republicans would like to vote for the retention of a faithful and unexceptional officer. I still think republicans would like to do so, and therefore I move to strike out the name which appears in the resolution and to put in its place the name of George C. Gorham; and on that I should like the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves to amend the resolution proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania by striking out the words "John C. Burch" and inserting the words "George C. Gorham." The question is on agreeing to this amendment, and on that question the Senator from New York asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EATON. One word. I hardly think that my friend from New York is quite aware of the full scope of his language. He said he desired to vote for a competent, honest gentleman, rather than a scoundrel. I hardly think he meant to convey the idea that there might not be a competent, honest gentleman nominated instead of Mr. Gorham. Mr. Gorham is competent, I agree; that he is a man of character, I agree; but it does not quite do for my friend from New York to characterize any one in the manner in which he does. Perhaps he did not intend it, but it left the impression on my mind that if Mr. Gorham was not selected there was the selection of a scoundrel, a man not competent to perform the duties of the office.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the fact that the Senator from Connecticut came anywhere near misunderstanding me shows that there must have been some ambiguity or shortcoming in my language; and I thank him for calling my attention to it. I had not in mind at the point of my remarks which he has referred to the Secretaryship of the Senate. I think the RECORD will show this. I made a general remark, not intended to touch any applicant for place in the Senate; perhaps it was an impatient remark, for I do not deny that I sometimes feel impatient at the cant which beclouds professions and practice in appointing and removing public officers. There are people whose idea of purity and reform seems to consist in canting incessantly about purity, in keeping up continuing sensation and proclamation as if they were holier than other people; and then when they find themselves in possession of the power to select or cause the selection of public agents, to divide with considerable impartiality their attention between such knaves and such fools as they feel indebted to for adulation or service. There are people who seem to think that something in the way of the "reform" is effected when a competent honest man is expelled from place and a rascal, a pretender or an incompetent is put in.

I was disclaiming for myself all such belief, without reference to these particular individuals, as I think the RECORD will show; and I said that my idea of civil-service reform was not to put out a faithful man who was competent—perhaps I said also that I did not believe even in cases of a vacancy in putting in either a knave or a fool even if that knave or that fool was able to stand on the corners of the street, make a long face, wring his hands, deplore the shortcomings of other people, and blow a horn, and say to the passers-by, "If you wish to see holiness look at me."

My remark, however, on this head was general, without, I beg to say, the slightest reference to the individual named in the original resolution. Nothing could have been further from my purpose than to put any possible imputation, direct or indirect, near or remote upon him.

I repeat that I am obliged to my friend from Connecticut for calling my attention to the fact that my remark might possibly be open to any such an interpretation. I meant as to the Secretaryship of the Senate, when I came to that, to say that the incumbent is in my belief as faithful and as competent an officer as can be found in all the length and breadth of the land.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say that I have known Mr. Burch for many years; I have known him long and well, and I have known the other nominees of the democratic party, Mr. Bright, of Indiana, and the other gentlemen to be elected; and for honesty, fidelity, and capacity they are the peers of the best men the republican party ever had in the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who is absent on account of illness. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (after having voted "nay.") I cast my vote inadvertently. I am paired to-day on all political questions with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here I am satisfied he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay;" but I beg leave to withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's vote is withdrawn.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. GORDON] is detained from the Senate by sickness, and would vote "nay" if present.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 38; as follows:

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the name of Mr. Bright and substituting "John R. French;" and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The resolution was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Sergeant-at-Arms-elect, with the remaining officers to be elected, will take the oath of office in the office of the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. WALLACE. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That Francis E. Shober be, and he is hereby, elected Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the name of Mr. Shober and substituting "William E. Spencer;" and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, on which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) As I before stated, I am paired to-day on all political questions with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] He would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this proposition.

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. THURMAN] is detained by sickness from the Senate, and is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] on these votes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the original resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I offer the following:

Resolved, That Henry E. Peyton be, and he is hereby, elected principal Executive Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend that resolution by striking out the name in the resolution and substituting that of "James R. Young."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when his name was called.) On this and all the other of these questions I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who is absent on account of illness. I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired on all political questions with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] On this proposition he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I voted inadvertently. I am paired on this question with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] I should vote "yea," as I did inadvertently, and he would vote "nay." I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to state that I was inadvertently out of the Chamber when the last roll was called. If I had been present, I should have voted "yea" upon the last call.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 35; as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the original resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I offer the following to dispose of the subject:

Resolved, That Rev. J. J. Bullock be, and he is hereby, elected Chaplain of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the name of Rev. Mr. Bullock and inserting that of Rev. Dr. Sunderland, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FERRY, (when the name of Mr. EDMUNDS was called.) The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] on leaving the Chamber, desired me to state that he was paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] Were he here the Senator from Vermont would vote "yea."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the original resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 25, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My attention is called by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the statement in the Journal—though I was not paying attention and did not hear it read—that the Senate proceeded "by unanimous consent" to the election of its officers, which is not according to the truth. I called the attention of the Chair to the fact, and asked him to put the question whether the Senate would proceed to the election.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator is right in his statement.

Mr. HOAR. That error is repeated as to the resolutions for the election of each of the officers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like the error to be corrected, if it turns out to be one, on looking at it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal will be corrected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It should be done.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 21st instant, a detailed statement of the accounts of the marshals of the United States in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, and Maryland, for and in regard to the employment of and payment of wages and fees charged for services rendered by them or their deputies in the conduct of elections in October and November, 1878, &c.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This information is responsive to a resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.]

Mr. WALLACE. I move that the communication be printed and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, in favor of an appropriation by Congress for additional improvements on the Yellowstone and Upper Missouri Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, in relation to the improvement and repair of the Muller wagon-road, and in favor of an appropriation by Congress for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KERNAN. I present a preamble and resolutions of the Oneida Historical Society of Utica, concerning a monument to General Herkimer. As it is short, I beg the indulgence of the Senate to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be reported.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, as follows:

ONEIDA HISTORICAL SOCIETY AT UTICA, NEW YORK.

At a regular meeting of the Oneida Historical Society at Utica, held at their rooms in the city of Utica, March 11, 1879, Hon. C. W. Hutchinson offered the following preamble and resolutions; which were unanimously adopted:

Whereas the Continental Congress of the United States of America, on the 4th of October, 1777, unanimously passed the following resolution, to wit:

"Resolved, That the governor and council of New York be desired to erect a monument, at Continental expense at the value of $500, to the memory of the late Brigadier Herkimer, who commanded the militia of Tryon County, in the State of New York, and was killed fighting gallantly in defense of the liberties of these States;" and

Whereas the money thus voted by the Continental Congress has never been appropriated by Congress, and the State of New York has never taken any action to carry out the request conveyed in the above resolution, although repeatedly urged to do so by Governor William H. Seward and others: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senators from the State of New York in the Congress of the United States, and Hon. CYRUS D. PRESCOTT, Hon. WARNER MILLER, and Hon. JOHN H. STARIN, the Representatives in Congress from the section of the State that was formerly Montgomery County, be respectfully requested to use their best endeavors to secure the passage of an act at the approaching extra session of Congress, appropriating the sum of $500, with simple interest from the date of the above resolution, for the purpose of erecting a monument that shall be a memorial of the gratitude of the American people to General Nicholas Herkimer, in order that the Government of the United States may redeem its pledge to do honor to the memory of that gallant defender of "the liberties of these States."

Resolved, That the senators and members of assembly of the Legislature of the State of New York from the same section of the State be respectfully requested to use their best efforts to secure from the Legislature some recognition of the duty imposed upon New York by the above resolution of the Continental Congress, and to urge the assistance of the State of New York, either by money or materials, in the work of erecting this monument.

Resolved, That the corresponding secretary of the Oneida Historical Society be instructed to forward to the Senators, Representatives, and members of the Legislature aforesaid copies of these resolutions.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I present a memorial very numerously signed by the mothers, wives, daughters, and sisters of Maine, in which they affirm, what I believe is true, that Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, and possessing that jurisdiction they respectfully ask that Congress will prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia except for medicinal, mechanical, and scientific purposes.

This memorial is signed by the best of mothers, wives, daughters, and sisters of my State. They are sincerely devoted to the object which they wish to accomplish; they are inspired by the very best of motives; foremost in every good work, they wish and long to see the day when the traffic in spirituous liquors may be prohibited in this District. That time perhaps has not yet arrived, but I commend this memorial to the careful consideration of the Committee on the District of Columbia, for I believe at least the time now is when much may be done in restricting the sale of intoxicating liquors in this District, and thus prevent much of the want, the misery, and the crime that spring therefrom.

I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GROOME. I present the petition of John M. Gordon, of Maryland, who is personally unknown to me, praying the repeal of the acts popularly known as the civil rights bill and the election supervisors law, if these acts be properly construed by certain United States judges. The petition is very brief, and as it sets forth in cogent language some of the reasons why a large majority of the people of my State desire the repeal or modification of the legislation specified, and as its phraseology is perfectly respectful, I ask that it may be read from the Clerk's desk and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be reported.

The petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The memorial of the undersigned, a citizen of the State of Maryland, and heretofore a native-born citizen of the State of Virginia, respectfully represents that, in common with many citizens of the above-mentioned States, members of the Federal Union, he has been much concerned at the operation of two acts of Congress known as the civil rights and election supervisors bill, especially as interpreted by a Federal judge in Eastern Virginia and by another in Maryland. By the ruling of the former (Judge Rives) juries are not to consist of "boni et legales homines," as the common law of every State requires, but are to be summoned without respect to intelligence, and to be composed "de mediatate coloris;" that is to say, of white men and negroes. By the decision of the Maryland Federal judge, (Bond,) under the Federal supervisors election law, they may enter the room appropriated to the legal judges of Federal elections and interfere with the execution of their duties. A Virginia Federal judge has decided this point differently: a legal voter may even be arrested at the polls and hurried to jail without previous due process of law; which is in gross violation of the provisions of the Constitution, and a substitution virtually of martial for civil law. Under this ruling, peaceable citizens may be intimidated from voting or serving as judges of election, being liable to arbitrary arrest and fine and imprisonment in the actual discharge of their legal rights and in the proper execution of their public duties by Federal supervisors, marshals, and their numerous deputies, appointed by Federal judges and paid for their services out of the public Treasury; all of which is in derogation of the reserved rights of the States and a great Federal evil. Your memorialist, therefore, prays your honorable body to inquire whether the aforesaid judges (Rives and Bond) have not given unjust and illegal decisions, and if their judgments are not in violation of those two acts of Congress above mentioned, that the said acts be repealed, because they violate the Constitution, subvert the rights of the several States of the Union, and tend to convert a Federal republic into a consolidated central, national despotism. And as in duty bound, your memorialist will ever pray.

JOHN M. GORDON.

PIKESVILLE, MARYLAND, March 22, 1879.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of an appropriation for the resurvey of the harbor at Kewaunee, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PADDOCK presented the petition of A. PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. COCKRELL, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in relation to the claim of the owners of the United States private armed brig General Armstrong be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Albert V. Conway be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Finance.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Sarah S. Flagg, executrix of W. C. Flagg, deceased, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That all papers upon the files of the Senate relating to the claim of Anson Dart be withdrawn therefrom and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. BURNSIDE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the cases of Charles B. Smith and Merritt Barber be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Ordered, That the papers in the cases of John Tweedy, E. V. Blackinston, Julia E. Seeley, and Nathaniel G. Smith be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

On motion of Mr. VOORHEES, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Mark Walker be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following order; which was read:

Resolved, That the petition and accompanying papers in the case of Jearum Atkins be taken from the files of the last session and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, notwithstanding the adverse report.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a statement in regard to that order. I made the adverse report in this case at the last session. The adverse report was based on the petition itself. Taking the petition to be true, the committee were of opinion that the petitioner had no case. The adverse report consisted merely of that statement in a sentence, and annexing the petition. By an accident at the Printing Office, instead of the petition on which the committee acted there was annexed a petition simply asking for a rehearing of his case, so that the Senate never had before it in accepting the report of the committee the petition on which the committee acted and which made the whole report. Therefore it seems to me to be an exception to the rule. I ask that the case may be recommitted and that the petitioner have another hearing, notwithstanding the adverse report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not object to the reference of the case, but I see no necessity for it unless there is something which will probably justify favorable action.

Mr. HOAR. The presumption is, although it is not true as a fact, that the Senate understands every report made from a committee on a petition, and acts upon it. It seems to me, therefore, that justice requires that the matter should be again brought before the Senate.

The order was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BLAINE. I am reported in the RECORD as absent, or not voting, upon the resolution yesterday in regard to the Executive Clerk. I am recorded on all the other votes, and I thought certainly that I voted for the retention of Mr. James R. Young. I desired to do so.

I have not had time to consult the Journal, but I make this statement lest I might seem to have been wanting.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator is not recorded as voting upon the question in the Journal.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know whether the rules permit me to have the vote corrected after the result has been announced. However, it is not essential, I will not ask that to be done; I merely give the notice.

PORT INSPECTORS.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I present a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture, addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, in relation to the salaries, traveling expenses, &c., of inspectors at the different shipping ports of the United States. I ask to have it read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be reported.

The letter was read, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., March 21, 1879.

SIR: At the last session of Congress I had the honor to ask for an appropriation of $50,000 (section 309) "to pay salaries and traveling expenses, and other necessary expenses of inspectors at the different shipping ports of the United States, and for controlling or eradicating infectious and contagious diseases among domesticated animals * * * to be immediately available."

The imminent and increasing danger from this cause to our commerce and a further acquaintance with the breadth of country over which the disease has now spread assure me that the amount first asked for will be altogether insufficient. I therefore respectfully request that the amount may be increased in the appropriation bill to $250,000.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

WM. G. LE DUC,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Hon. J. W. JOHNSTON,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture, United States Senate.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. BURNSIDE presented certain papers relating to the reorganization of the Army, to accompany the bill (S. No. 25) to reduce and reorganize the Army of the United States, and to make rules for its government and regulation; which were ordered to be printed as a supplement to Senate report of committee No. 555, Forty-fifth Congress, third session.

CENTENNIAL MEMORIAL.

Mr. McDONALD (by request) submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the Library:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized and directed to purchase from the author a copy of the centennial memorial of the Government, entitled "The administrators of the United States Government at the beginning of its second century," the same to belong to the files and records of the Senate and to be suitably framed and displayed where it will be accessible to the public; the cost of which shall not exceed $100; the same to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

ADVANCEMENT OF AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, during the last session I offered the resolution which I now send to the desk, and it passed the Senate unanimously, but for want of time was lost in the House. It is a concurrent resolution. I ask leave to submit it now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas agriculture is the foundation of nearly all our wealth, and it is mainly through the exportation of its products that we are paying off our large indebtedness, foreign and domestic, and have the present large balance of trade in our favor; and

Whereas although about one-half of the people of this country are engaged in agricultural pursuits and all other interests are dependent upon this, our leading and most important interest, commercial and otherwise, yet but little has been done by the General Government to promote agriculture, while other less general and important interests have been largely aided: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the committees on agriculture of the respective Houses be, and they are hereby, instructed to consider generally the subject of agriculture, and report, by bill or otherwise, what can or ought to be done by the General Government to better advance, encourage, and foster agricultural interests, and that said committees shall have the power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the resolution be printed and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the Calendar of resolutions and concurrent resolutions introduced before this day in their order.

The Secretary read the first resolution on the Calendar, being the one submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 21st instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the refusal by one House of Congress to make necessary provision for the support of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, and for the defense of the country, except upon condition that the other House and the President shall give their assent to legislation which they disapprove, and the refusal by Congress to make such provision except upon condition that the President shall give such assent, are unconstitutional, revolutionary, and if persisted in must lead to the overthrow of constitutional government and the destruction of the national life.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he desires to have this resolution considered to-day or only to speak to it. I make the inquiry because I have an amendment which I desire to offer, which, with the permission of the Senator, I will send to the Secretary's desk and have reported.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to address the Senate upon the resolution, and after that I should like to have it acted upon, if the Senate is ready for it, and that, I suppose, would be the most convenient time for the Senator's amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I will, therefore, ask that my amendment be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield for that purpose?

Mr. HOAR. The only objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama is that reporting it requires it to be put in print as part of my speech. I should rather have it come at the end, if the Senator pleases. That is all. There is no other objection to the course he suggests.

Mr. MORGAN. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts might desire to know what my views are on the subject, and that he would wish to speak to the amendment I propose to offer, particularly if he desires the resolution to be considered to-day.

Mr. HOAR. I should prefer not to have the amendment come in at this time, because that would require it to be printed as part of my remarks, which I do not desire.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, Congress has come together under circumstances without a parallel in our history. The last Congress sat for eleven months out of the twenty-four. It applied itself with industry to the duties of legislation. The two Houses agreed with remarkable unanimity on all details of public expenditure. There was no difference in regard to any usual or needful appropriation which a free conference did not or would not easily and harmoniously adjust. The failure to make appropriations for the support of the Government, which the President assigns as his reason for convening Congress, was not caused by a disagreement between the two branches upon any single item needed for the public service, but by the willful and deliberate refusal of one branch to give its constitutional assent to enactments as to which both were agreed.

Nothing in the foreign relations of the country, nothing in its domestic condition demands instant legislation. It is a time of profound peace. There is not a controversy, there is scarcely a diplomatic discussion with any power on earth. The late President of the Republic, as he goes from nation to nation, and from continent to continent, finds rulers and people alike eager to throw open their gates and to salute the flag with whose safety and glory his own name is so inseparably blended.

No petitions from any quarter of the country indicate public grievances which cannot await the accustomed course and time for redress. No department of business asks present relief from legislation. On the contrary every man who has his living to get by honest trade or by honest labor unites in the one eager desire for that security which the vacation of the Legislature alone affords.

The purpose of our assembling is not chiefly a legislative purpose. It is, if I am right in my view of it, an attempt, by a simple but most effective process, to do away with that clause in the Constitution which provides that it shall be amended only by the assent of two-thirds of each House and three-fourths of the States, and that no amendment shall deprive any State of its equality in the Senate without its consent. The power which rightfully can be transferred from the President only by three-fourths of the States and from the Senate by the unanimous consent of all, it is proposed to get into the hands of one House by a very simple and effective process.

That the country may see that I do not overstate this purpose let me state it in the language of one who knows all about it. The honorable Senator from Kentucky was one of the conferees appointed by the Senate at the last session on the executive, legislative, and judicial appropriation bill. He represented the party, then the minority, now the majority in this body. He reported to us the purposes of the House as he had learned them from the majority of the conferees on the part of the House with whom he had conferred. This is what he said:

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I was one of the conferees on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill when two earnest efforts were made to agree, but we found it impossible. The Senator from Minnesota has stated correctly that upon all questions pertaining to the appropriations, the great probability is that we could have agreed, though I believe we did not finally agree even as to them. He is also correct in stating that the House conferees insisted upon retaining that portion of the bill to which he has alluded, but it was also equally certain that the majority of the Senate conferees with equal pertinacity insisted upon the Senate amendments and maintained that each and all the provisions inserted by the House should be stricken out. There was no attempt at any division of the subjects. * * * The House insisted that the armed soldiers of the United States should not be allowed to approach the polls for the mere purpose of keeping the peace, that there should be an honest jury obtained in the courts of the United States in all cases where the rights and liberties of citizens were involved, and that the States should be allowed to conduct their own elections in their own way, free from all Federal interference, and the democratic conferees on the part of the House seemed determined that unless those rights were secured to the people in the bills sent to the Senate they would refuse, under their constitutional right, to make appropriations to carry on the Government if the dominant majority in the Senate insisted upon the maintenance of these laws and refused to consent to their repeal.

They seemed further to agree, and I agreed with them, that if an extra session must be called, much as it is to be regretted, the very moment it is called the committees of both Houses would be organized and separate bills would be framed and passed as soon as possible asking the President of the United States to agree with the representatives of the States and people.

* * * * * * *

We insist that those matters pertain solely to the States and are part of their absolute right. * * * When these three laws are submitted to the President for his approval, as they will be, and are approved by him * * * the next Congress will in my opinion be ready to pass every appropriation bill. * * * If, however, the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power vested in him, should see fit to veto the bills thus presented to him, which I repeat will simply be to keep soldiers from the polls, to allow proper jurors to serve who will try cases honestly, and allow the States to control their own election, then I have no doubt those same amendments will be again made part of the appropriation bills, and it will be for the President to determine whether he will block the wheels of government and refuse to accept necessary appropriations rather than allow the representatives of the people to repeal odious laws which they regard as subversive of their rights and privileges. * * * Whether that course is right or wrong, it will be adopted, and I have no doubt adhered to, no matter what happens with the appropriation bills.

This statement, Mr. President, was followed by a very remarkable speech from the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] He declared that he had thought long and deeply upon this question; that it was one of the gravest questions which ever had arisen for consideration or discussion in the American Congress; that it involved not only the merits or demerits of laws, but involved the rights, privileges, powers, and duties of the two branches of Congress. He said:

It is a vast question; it is a question whose importance can scarcely be estimated. * * * It is a question which sooner or later must be decided.

He goes on to say:

We claim the right, which the House of Commons in England established after two centuries of contest, to say that we will not grant the money of the people unless there is a redress of grievances. * * * England was saved from despotism and an absolute monarchy by the exercise of the power of the House of Commons to refuse supplies except upon conditions that grievances should be redressed. * * * It is a mistake to suppose that it was a fight simply between the Throne and the Commons; it was equally a fight between the Lords and the Commons; and the result of two centuries of contest in England was the rule that the House of Lords has no right to amend a money bill.

Then the Senator goes on to argue that our Constitution has made no change in this English practice, except in the provision that the Senate may make an amendment to a bill for raising revenue as upon other bills. The Senator then goes on to call attention to the fact that the two Senators from Rhode Island, representing a small State with a population of one hundred thousand, as he supposes, have the same vote upon this floor as the two Senators who represent the great State of New York, with its more than four million tax-payers. The Senator further says that it was intended by the framers of the Constitution to countervail this inequality by the provision that all money bills must originate in the House of Representatives and that that House had the power to say, "we will only grant supplies upon condition that grievances are redressed."

The scheme as thus stated, if not by its authors, by its leading champions, strikes from the Constitution the veto power of the President, and compels the Senate to register the decrees of the House, and vests in the House the executive powers, as they are now vested in the House of Commons in England, as the price of the continuance of the Government.

The National Government may be destroyed by a failure to exercise its powers. The simple refusal by a majority of the States to elect Senators, or the refusal by a majority of the Senators elected to assemble for legislation, would of course operate the destruction of the Government. So the refusal to pass the executive, legislative, and judicial appropriation bill and the Army bill, persisted in for a considerable length of time, must bring the National Government to an end. The bills now in question contain the sole provision for the support and movement of the Army, for the compensation of the President and of Congress, for the necessary expenses of legislation, for the pay of the heads, clerks, and officers of the several Executive Departments, and the expenses of their administration, including especially the Pension Office and the Surgeon-General's Office, the General Post-Office, the Treasury, and the Mint; the sole provision for legislature and judiciary in all the Territories, and the sole provision for the salaries of all the judges of the United States, of all prosecuting officers, for the fees of witnesses and jurors, and defraying the expenses of the administration of justice in all the courts of the United States, and for the custody of all criminals under sentence or awaiting trial. On the 30th of June the support and movement of the Army, legislation and the administration of justice in all the Territories, the receipt and disbursement of all public moneys at the Treasury, including the payment of all pensioners, and of the interest on the national debt, the Post-Office, all the courts of the United States, and the confinement of all criminals are to stop, according to this precious scheme which the honorable Senator from Ohio tells us he has thought of so long and so carefully, if the President of the United States happen to agree in opinion with our predecessors and his, who enacted certain laws now on our statute-books, and, so agreeing, shall refuse to violate his oath of office.

The Constitution provides that the President shall have a compensation payable at stated times, which shall not be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected; and that the judges shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. It further provides that "every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it." It is now proposed to declare that neither he nor the judges shall receive this compensation unless he will flatly violate this clause and sign a bill he does not approve. This is a scheme to coerce the President, not in his executive capacity, but in his function as a part of the legislature, to prevent his performance of a duty expressly prescribed and defined by the Constitution, not merely to affect his executive discretion. The coercion to be applied is the creation of a great public mischief, not the creation of a personal inconvenience to the President.

If the President were to announce to Congress a purpose to exercise his share of legislative power on the principles stated by the Senator from Kentucky, that is, to refuse his signature to all appropriations unless such legislation as he should demand were assented to by Congress, that Senator would hardly, I think, deny that he was liable to impeachment.

The coercion is to be applied with reference to a law which the Senator from Ohio has in substance declared was a subject of fair difference of opinion among Senators, a law passed by all constitutional forms, by a more than two-third vote, which has been on the statute-book fourteen years, there having been abundant opportunity to test its constitutionality before the courts.

There is a loose popular notion, which seems even to have impressed the minds of some Senators, that there is a resemblance between the power anciently exercised by the English House of Commons to refuse supplies until grievances were redressed, and the position now assumed by the Senators from Ohio and Kentucky. I have examined English history with some care with reference to this matter. Senators who make such examinations may possibly be surprised to find how little analogy there is between the action of the House of Commons with relation to granting or withholding supplies, and the wild scheme of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber.

The Parliamentary History affords the material, if there were time, for giving a narrative of every occasion when the Commons have exerted their power of withholding supplies as a means of compelling a redress of grievances from the conquest to the present hour. I shall content myself with two or three brief citations from authorities whose decisive weight will not be questioned. They establish these facts.

First. The Commons never withheld the supplies as a means of coercing the assent of the Crown or the Lords to legislation.

Second. The supplies withheld were not supplies needed for the ordinary functions of government, to which the ordinary revenues of the Crown were sufficient, but were for extraordinary occasions, as to pay the king's debts or to conduct foreign wars.

Third. That when the hereditary revenues of the Crown or those settled on the king for life at the beginning of his reign ceased to be sufficient for the maintenance of government and for public defense the practice of withholding supplies ceased.

Fourth. There has been no instance since the revolution of 1688 of attaching general legislation to a bill for raising or appropriating money, and scarcely, if ever, such an instance before that date. When such an attempt has been made it has been resisted, denounced, and abandoned, and the English constitutional authorities, without exception, are agreed that such a proceeding is unwarrantable, revolutionary, and destructive of the English constitution.

From the Norman conquest until a comparatively recent period the king possessed revenues entirely independent of Parliament, ample for all the functions of government and for his personal expenditure. In theory all the property of the realm was his. In 1377 two-tenths were granted to King Richard II as an aid, but upon the condition recited in the statute, "that the king should not for the future burden the people by extorting money of the subject upon such demands, but should live upon his own and maintain his wars, for that his own royal patrimony was sufficient for him, as well to keep his house as to defray the charge of the war." (Stevens's Historical Account of Taxation, page 101.)

The statute, 1 Anne, chapter 185, recites that—

The necessary expenses of supporting the Crown, or the greater part of them, were formerly defrayed by a land revenue, which had, from time to time, been impaired by the grants of former kings and queens, so that Her Majesty's land revenues could then afford very little toward the support of her government.

Sir Thomas Erskine May says:

The entire lands of the realm were originally held of the Crown by various feudal tenures, and the royal revenues were derived from fines, fees, first fruits and tenths, and other profits arising from those lands, and from the rents of the ancient demesnes of the Crown. To support the barbarous magnificence of his household—his numerous retainers and rude hospitality—was nearly the sole expense of the king, for as feudal superior he commanded the services of his tenants in the field, who fought by his side with an army of men and horses equipped and maintained at their own expense.—Court Hist., vol. 1, p. 225.

One great contest between the Crown and the Parliaments related not to the matter of supply, but to the improvident alienation by the sovereign of the crown lands.

May further says:

While this waste of the Crown property had been injurious to the public revenues, it favored the development of the liberties of the people. Kings with vast hereditary revenues—husbanded and improved—would have been comparatively independent of Parliament. But their improvidence gradually constrained them to rely on the liberality of their subjects, until their own necessities and the increasing expenditure of the State at length placed them entirely under the control of Parliament. (Vol. 1, p. 230.)

In the reign of Charles II the principle of appropriating supplies to specific service by statute was formally established as one of the conditions under which Parliament granted money for the service of the State. It had been customary for Parliament to grant to the king, at the commencement of each reign, the ordinary revenues of the Crown, which were estimated to provide in time of peace for the support of His Majesty's dignity and civil government and for the public defense. To these were added from time to time special grants for extraordinary occasions. The ordinary revenues were derived, first, from the hereditary revenues of the Crown itself, and, secondly, from the produce of taxes voted to the king for life. The hereditary revenues consisted of the rents of Crown lands, of feudal rights, the proceeds of the post-office, and wine licenses, and after the surrender of feudal tenures by Charles II, in 1660, of part of the excise duties. (Ib., p. 231.)

It is true that the luxury or the ambition of kings or their indulgent bounty to their favorites led them to assemble Parliament and to ask additional supplies from their subjects. It is also true that these requests furnished the occasion to the Commons to stipulate for redress of grievances. But the grievances so redressed had no relation to the laws of the realm. These laws were made or altered by the free assent of the three estates in whom the law-making power vested by the constitution. The grievances of which the Commons sought redress, whether from Tudor, Plantagenet, or Stuart, were the improper use of prerogatives, the granting oppressive monopolies, the waging of costly foreign wars, the misconduct of favorites and the like. The improvident expenditure of the royal patrimony, the granting the crown lands or pensions to unworthy persons, is a frequent ground of complaint. (Parl. Hist., vol. 1, p. 46., vol. 5, p. 240, 333, 345–8.)

In the first year of Charles I, Sir John Eliot—

Proposed to consider the state of the country and a relief for grievances. * * * For particulars, first, the consideration of the king's revenue; next, an account how the subsidies and fifteenths granted in the 21st James were expended, and therein to include the examination of the carriage and miscarriage of the last fleet, misgovernment, misemployment of the king's revenues, miscounseling, &c.

The compiler of the Parliamentary History adds:

These orders and resolutions, without one word of a supply, showed but a very unpromising beginning of this Parliament, and seemed to hint to the ministry, that without great attention among them little relief was to be expected from this body.—Parl. Hist., 6, p. 423, an. 1, bar. 1.

The Petition of Right in 1628, after setting forth the illegal exaction of loans, the illegal quartering of soldiers in private houses, the illegal imprisonment of the subject, prays that these things may take place no longer:

All which they most humbly pray of your most excellent majesty, as their rights and liberties according to the laws and statutes of this realm.

The full statement of grievances made by the Commons a few years later, repeated with their demand for specific remedy, abundantly confirms this statement. (10 Parl. Hist., 60–89, 400–410.)

Mr. President, I challenge the production of a single instance in English or American history in which the withholding the supplies has been used as a weapon to coerce legislation. At the accession of William and Mary by the revolution of 1688, the Commons established the practice of granting the taxes for a single year, instead of for the king's life. Since that time there have been many earnest struggles in which Crown, Lords, and Commons have taken different sides. But, however political passions may have raged, from the time when the head of Sir Robert Walpole was not safe on his shoulders down to the fierce conflict of the reform bill, the Commons have never refused for an hour to provide for the support of government.

Sir Thomas Erskine May, in his Constitutional History, vol. 2, p. 102, declares that this power has not been exercised since the revolution:

Nor have the Commons, by postponing grants, or in other words, by "stopping the supplies," endeavored to coerce the other powers in the state. No more formidable instrument could have been placed in the hands of a popular assembly for bending the executive to its will. It had been wielded with effect when the prerogative of kings was high, and the influence of the Commons low; but now the weapon lies rusty in the armory of constitutional warfare.

Not once since the reign of William III have the demands of the Crown for the public service been refused. (P. 100.)

In that memorable parliamentary struggle in which, at the age of twenty-four, Pitt single-handed encountered a hostile majority in the House of Commons led by Burke and Fox and Sheridan, it was proposed to withhold the supplies to coerce the king to remove his ministry. But the opposition did not persist, and the supplies were voted. During the controversy the House undertook by its own authority to forbid the lords of the treasury to exercise the discretion vested in them by law to accept bills from India. The House of Commons retreated rather ignominiously from its position. Mr. Gifford in his Life of Pitt well says:

To admit the existence of a right in any one part of the legislative body to suspend an act for the formation of which the concurrence of the whole is requisite, is to violate one of the most obvious of all constitutional principles and to introduce disorder and misrule into a system justly celebrated for its harmony and its efficacy.

Fox, the champion of popular liberty, earnestly disclaimed any purpose of withholding supplies. (Parl. Hist., vol. 24.) Much less has there been an instance of attempting to compel the upper house or the Crown to consent to changes in existing law by attaching legislative provisions to appropriation bills or tax bills.

In the year 1704 a portion of the tory majority in the House of Commons undertook to tack the bill against occasional conformity (which punished persons who had taken the sacrament for the purpose of entering upon any office of trust and afterward attended a dissenters' meeting) to the land-tax bill. The historian, Oldmixon, gives a graphic account of the debate. Sir Thomas Littleton, late speaker, said:

"Gentlemen, by the tacking of this bill we mean to throw a necessity upon the Lords to pass it; but suppose the Lords think fit to untack what we have tacked, and to acquaint us that they are ready to pass the money bill but will consider of the other. Pray, whose fault will the nation account it to be that the queen's service is retarded?" Little was or could be said to these arguments, and still less to the strong one, that the tacking it was a breach of the constitution, as it took from the Lords their ancient and undoubted right of a negative upon any bills from the Commons, money bills only excepted. If the tacking question had been carried in the affirmative, the Parliament had been dissolved and all the wheels of the great machine, the war, stopped at once, and the liberties of England and all Europe, the Protestant religion, the present age and the future, would have been sacrificed to France for a dream of the church's danger, under a queen who was one of its most zealous members. When it came to a pinch, near one hundred and twenty members fell off from the tories and voted with those who were in the true interest of their country; and upon the question whether the bill should be tacked or not it passed in the negative—yeas 134, nays 251. Those unhappy one hundred and thirty-four became so odious to the nation that near fifty of them were thrown out at the next election.

Burnet, volume 5, page 180, relates the attempt to tack the bill against occasional conformity to a money bill in 1704–'5:

Those who opposed it said this now aimed at was a change in the whole constitution, and was in effect turning it into a commonwealth, for it imported the denying not only to the Lords but to the Crown the free use of their negative in the legislature. If this was once settled, then as often as the public occasions made a money bill necessary everything that the majority in their house had a mind to would be tacked to it.

December 9, 1702, it was ordered and declared by the Lords—

That the annexing any clause or clauses to a bill of aid or supply the matter of which is foreign to and different from the matter of the said bill of aid or supply is unparliamentary, and tends to the destruction of the constitution of this government.

And this is the standing rule in Parliament to-day.

In no instance—

Says Mr. Hamersham Cox, in his treatise entitled The Institutions of the English Government—since the revolution of 1688 have the Commons by refusing the supplies endeavored to coerce the other powers of the state.

Hatsell observes, volume 3, page 195, et seq.:

Whenever this measure of tacking to a bill of supply is attempted by the House of Commons, with an intention of thereby compelling the Crown or the Lords to give their assent to a bill which they would otherwise probably disapprove of and reject, it is highly irregular; and it is a breach of those parliamentary rules and orders that have been established by long and uniform practice between the two houses in the mode of passing bills.

To do this in cases where it is known that one of the component parts of the bill will be disagreeable to the Crown or to the Lords, and that if it was sent up alone it would not be agreed to—from this cause, and with a view to secure the royal assent or the concurrence of the Lords, to tack it to a bill of supply which the exigencies of the state make necessary, is a proceeding highly dangerous and unconstitutional. It tends to provoke the other branches of the legislature in their turn to depart from those rules to which they ought to be restrained by the long and established forms of Parliament, and can have no other effect than finally to introduce disorder and confusion. The Commons are by the practice of Parliament entitled to insist "that the Lords shall make no alteration in a bill of supply." Not to avail themselves of this right, and thereby to refuse to the House of Lords the exercise of that privilege which they have as one of the legislature "to give their dissent to a proposition they disapprove of" without at the same time being obliged to reject the supply which the public necessities demand, and which they are ready and desirous to grant, is to confound those separate rights that belong to each House of Parliament, and thereby to introduce and encourage proceedings which must in their consequences prove dangerous to the constitution. The Lords, therefore, in their answer to the attempt which was made by the Commons in 1699, replied with great weight:

"The joining together in a money bill things so totally foreign to the methods of raising money, and to the quantity or qualification of the sums to be raised, is wholly destructive of the freedom of debates, dangerous to the privileges of the Lords and to the prerogative of the Crown. For, by this means, things of the last ill consequence to the nation may be brought into money bills, and yet neither the Lords nor the Crown be able to give their negative to them without hazarding the public peace and security. * * * In short, however desirable the end may be that is at any time aimed at by this measure, the means are always bad. It is much safer to trust to time and to circumstances, which sooner or later dispose the minds of men to accept and approve of such propositions as are really for the public good, than to obtain even the best of laws by breaking down those bounds and fences which the wisdom of past ages has set up, and to let in disorder and confusion, which may finally prove fatal to the security, perhaps to the existence, of the constitution."

I have been particular in examining the legislative precedents in the country from which so much of our institutions has been derived, because an error that seems to have misled Senators may well be supposed not to be without an effect, in some quarters, upon the people. The doctrine which has caused this Congress to be called together is as new as it is monstrous. It finds no support, countenance, or analogy in the history of constitutional liberty in England. The weapon with which the leaders of the democratic party threaten the constitutional life of our Republic, the English people would have disdained, in their extremest need, in their most deadly contests with despotism. No English patriot ever proposed to refuse to provide for the defense of the realm, the administration of justice, or the faithful execution of the laws until the House of Commons could force the constitutional assent of King or Lords to legislation which they disapproved. Supplies were never withheld to government, but only to royal personal expenditure. They were never withheld to coerce legislation or to coerce the exercise of an admitted royal power, but only to prevent unconstitutional exercises of prerogative. When they were withheld the Crown had full means of supporting government and of defending the country in its hereditary revenues, or those settled on king for life, and in its right to demand military service from its vassals.

But there is a broader and simpler distinction between the two cases. The mistake, the gross, palpable mistake, which these gentlemen fall into in making this comparison, lies at the threshold. The House of Commons, in its discretion, used to grant, and sometimes now grants, supplies to the king. The American Congress, in its discretion, never grants supplies to the President under any circumstances whatever. The only appropriation of the public money to which that term can properly apply, the provision for the President's compensation, is by design and of purpose placed wholly out of the power of Congress. The provision is peremptory that—

The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Alexander Hamilton, in No. 72 of the Federalist, declares that the very purpose of this enactment is to put it beyond the power of Congress to compel the President "to surrender at discretion his judgment to their inclinations."

This is no blow at the President. It is a blow at the Constitution. This is not a threat to withhold supplies. It is a threat to abandon the constitutional functions of government. It is a threat to suspend the operation of the Constitution itself. It is a threat to disobey the explicit mandate of the fundamental law by those servants to whom above all others in the Republic the people have intrusted their dearest interests, relying only on their honor and their sense of duty. It is not supply that is withheld; it is the establishment of justice. It is not supply; it is the provision for the common defense. It is not supply; it is the preservation of domestic tranquillity. It is not supply; it is the promotion of the general welfare.

The obligation to provide for the expenses of government rests upon the Senate and House just as does their obligation to meet; just as the obligation to hear and decide causes rests upon the judges; just as his obligation to nominate and appoint officers and to take care that the laws be faithfully executed rests upon the President; just as the obligation to engage the enemy rests upon the general in the field; just as the obligation rests upon every executive officer to discharge the functions of his office. All these civil officers would be punishable by impeachment, and in many cases by indictment, for wanton or willful disobedience to this obligation of duty. The military or naval officer for like offense may be punished with death. The individual member of Senate or House who should permanently and without excuse absent himself from his duties might doubtless, in the high discretion of the body to which he belonged, be punished by expulsion. In the nature of things, consistently with constitutional liberty, there can be no punishment for a majority of a legislative body which shall wantonly and in disregard of oaths refuse to execute its constitutional trust. Above all persons in the service of the Republic, it is the peculiar dignity and glory of the legislator that the safety of the state is intrusted to his sense of duty alone, without other safeguard or sanction.

What need of discussing English examples in the presence of the clear behests of our own written Constitution? English political history is a steady growth from an almost unchecked despotism to a republic. The American Constitution provides legislative, executive, and judicial processes, and the restraints on those processes for a republic already established. I said just now that there could be no supply in the English sense under our Constitution and laws, except that which is expressly removed from legislative discretion, the compensation of the President. But the framers of our Constitution took care not only that there should be no supplies to withhold from or grant to the king, but they made the still more important arrangement that there should be no king from whom to withhold them. The President of the United States has no more interest or concern with the items of appropriation which the Senators in defiance of the duty imposed by the Constitution threaten to withhold than the humblest citizen. He is one servant; Congress is another. Each has its appropriate and carefully limited sphere of power and of duty. The thing that the framers of the Constitution chiefly feared was the "propensity of the legislative department to intrude upon the rights and to absorb the powers of the other departments." This fear, continually expressed in the Constitution, is reiterated in the pages of the Federalist. To guard against this danger the duty is enjoined upon Congress—a duty which has the express sanction of every Senator's oath of office—to see that his compensation is paid at stated times without diminution during his term, and the constitutional and effectual defense of his negative upon legislation is placed in his hands. The power of impeachment and the power to pass laws by a two-third vote afford abundant protection against grievances from the Executive.

The complicated system of rules in force in the House of Representatives makes it exceedingly difficult for any single measure to gain attention. Every appropriation bill must go to the Committe of the Whole where every member has full opportunity to offer amendments. Other bills in the struggle for the attention of the House have to encounter not only the opposition of those opposed to the bill, but of friends who desire to give preference to measures in which they take greater interest. The same is to a less extent true in the Senate. The practice has thus grown up of placing general legislation upon appropriation bills, not to compel the assent of the other branch or of the President, but merely to compel its consideration. I do not defend this practice. It leads and has led to great abuse. It has been complained of by many men of the highest authority in both parties. But it affords no excuse for the present attempt at usurpation, for which there can be found but one or two parallels in our history. In 1855, the House put upon the civil and diplomatic bill sections reducing the tariff. This was denounced by men of all parties in the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is a most dangerous precedent; it is an example that has never been set to us before, and I hope will never be attempted again.

Mr. COOPER. It is objectionable because it forces Senators to act upon compulsion.

Mr. Bayard opposed the provision in a weighty argument too long to be extracted. I read two or three sentences:

I do not know that I should have any objection to this tariff bill if it came here as a separate measure and was thoroughly discussed. When it comes to us in this shape, it is coercive legislation on this body and it is coercive legislation in this body on the minority of the body. If legislation is coercive, it matters not what is the source or motive which tempts to be coercion. The principle is equally erroneous in legislation; it equally strikes at the fundamental basis on which deliberative assemblies in a free government must necessarily be constituted.

This is no mere point of order; it is an important and vital question. We have gone on some steps and we come now to an issue which will try the form of this Government to its utmost. It will last in all time. Though I may deem a measure valuable, I would rather see it lost, and rely upon the sense of the country to return representatives afterward who would pass it, than to sacrifice a great principle which I think lies at the bottom of all legislative organization in free countries of not permitting coercive legislation.

Is there not one man left on the democratic side of this Chamber to whom the voice of Bayard still speaks with authority?

Mr. Seward declared the proposition to be of a revolutionary character, and thanked the Senators from Delaware for the fidelity with which they had sustained the independence of the Senate.

The sections were stricken out by the Senate and abandoned by the House. Thus ended the first attempt in our history of the other House of Congress to usurp the functions of Senate and President.

In 1856 a provision was ingrafted upon the Army bill that no part of the Army should be used to enforce the enactments of the Legislative Assembly at Shawnee Mission, in Kansas, until Congress had determined as to their validity, and directing the President to use the military forces of the United States to keep the peace in the Territory and to disarm the existing militia of Kansas. To this the Senate refused its assent. The bill failed, and an extra session was forthwith called. This proceeding, so far as relates to the first proviso, was, in my judgment, entirely proper and constitutional, and has no resemblance to that under consideration. So far there was no attempt to change existing law. The House there exercised its undoubted constitutional right of limiting an appropriation by declaring that no part of it should be used for a purpose which it held unlawful. It was to prevent an unconstitutional use of the Army by the President that the appropriation was limited. The clause in the Constitution that no appropriation for the use of the Army shall be for a longer term than two years was inserted for that very purpose.

The other provisions were justly liable to censure. They sought to force upon the President and Senate new legislation against their will. At the special session held three days after the adjournment the House abandoned this ground and sought only to place upon the bill a proviso limiting the authority of the President to use the troops for whose support appropriation was made. But the Senate remained steadfast, and the whole legislation upon the subject was stricken out of the bill.

On one other occasion only has any similar attempt been made. In 1865 the democrats in the House, uniting with a few republicans led by Winter Davis, placed upon the Army bill a clause providing that no man should be tried by military courts in any State where a court of the United States was held. The Senate struck out the clause. A large majority of the House were for concurring in the amendment. But Mr. Davis was able to command votes enough to filibuster until the session ended, and the bill was lost.

In all these cases the legislation disapproved by the Senate has sooner or later been abandoned, and the appropriation has been made. Frequently has legislation devised by the House been brought to the attention of the Senate or the President upon an appropriation bill. Never has the claim been maintained, never has it been strenuously insisted on, that either or both Houses would bring the Government to a stop if they could not have their way.

Senators would doubtless disavow any purpose to resort to force or to break up the Legislature by withdrawal from the Capitol. But it would be difficult to draw a logical distinction between the withdrawal of Senators and Representatives from the halls of legislation and their remaining only to refuse to carry on the Government.

Mr. President, what are the grievances which seem to Senators on the other side to justify this second attempt at revolution? They are laws—laws passed by constitutional methods—passed, I believe, by a two-third vote; laws which have been on the statute-book many years with the fullest opportunity to test their constitutionality in the courts. Will any Senator claim that Congress has not the right to make regulations concerning the manner of holding elections for Representatives? The grievance is that the American people, acting through their Representatives in the National Legislature, having determined to exercise their clear constitutional power of regulating the manner of national elections, have taken some of the precautions usual in the States in like cases for protecting those elections against violence and fraud.

The three grievances complained of are the power to use troops in case of absolute necessity to keep peace at the polls, the power to appoint officers to see fair play at elections, and the discretion vested in the judges of the United States to administer to jurors an oath that they have not been guilty of what the Constitution of the United States defines as treason. It is true there is in the Revised Statutes a provision of a law long since repealed, re-enacted by mistake, making it a cause of peremptory challenge to have taken part in rebellion. The Senate passed a bill last winter repealing this section, and it only remains on the statute-book to-day because the democratic majority in the House did not agree to the bill.

Section 821 is important only as a law against future treason. It provides:

SEC. 821. At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney, or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court, in their discretion, may require the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror, or venireman or talesman, in said court, the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money, or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

I do not deem it likely that there will be any immediate occasion for its exercise. Nor should I much regret its repeal if it were to be accomplished by the deliberate and unmenaced judgment of Congress and the President. The strongest reason for its continuance is the temper with which its repeal is demanded.

Gentlemen seem to suppose that the statute authorizing the use of troops if needful to keep peace at the polls is of recent origin. There has been no time since the formation of the Government when the President might not lawfully have employed the military power of the United States to protect the peaceable exercise of any public function which was being performed under its constitutional authority against forcible invasion. There has been no time since the formation of the Government when a single person has been restrained or intimidated in casting his vote by any military power whatever. What is new in the statute of 1865 is the stringent legislation now found in sections 5528 to 5532 and sections 2002 and 2003 of the Revised Statutes. These sections affix heavy penalties for every interference by any officer of the Army or Navy with the freedom of elections, the qualification of voters, or the conduct of the election officers. He is held responsible, at the peril of utter ruin, at the peril of imprisonment without discretion, for the existence of the fact of the absolute necessity for keeping the peace. He is punishable by imprisonment and by fine if he interfere with any provision for the regulation of elections, with any citizen's right to cast a free vote, or with the conduct in any mode of the election officers.

Is there a State in the Union where there is not reserved to the executive the power to avail itself of the military forces to preserve the peace in case of extreme necessity? So of the election laws. They contain simple provisions which, without depriving the State officers of the power to make registration, conduct elections, and count the vote, appoint officers of the United States to see fair play, to know what goes on, with power to arrest persons who actually commit crimes against the elective franchise in their presence. There is no jurisdiction on earth where the power to arrest for high crimes or misdemeanors committed in their presence is not vested in the officers of the law. Will Senators on the other side of the Chamber, in the light of our recent history, venture to deny the necessity of legislation for the protection of the purity of the ballot?

If the United States be a government it possesses and must exercise the powers necessary for its own preservation, to which the security and purity of the ballot-box are absolutely essential. What need to guarantee to the States a republican form of government and to pledge them the power of the United States as their protection against domestic violence if the United States cannot against armed ruffians make the polls safe where their own sovereignty is ultimately lodged, or secure the honest expression of their own will through republican forms? What need to set apart a district in their exclusive jurisdiction, a district into which no other power can enter, for the functions of a government which is to represent no people and be the choice of no constitutional majority, but whose selection is at the mercy of ruffians or of knaves?

I am no alarmist. I would rather find ground of hope and confidence than of apprehension in the present position of affairs. I do not think it desirable in a republic that its powers should forever be exercised by one political party where there are two equally devoted to its preservation and to its fundamental principles. But I cannot fail to see, and seeing I cannot fail to declare, that this is no mere difference as to party policies under a constitution which all alike obey. It is a refusal to submit to the constitutional authority to which is intrusted the enactment and repeal of laws. To-day this weapon may be directed against the President. Three weeks ago it was directed against the Senate. Then the Senator from Ohio reminded us of the inequality of population in the States and that the vote of Rhode Island is as powerful in the Senate as the vote of New York. Now we are told that the President is but one man against many men; as if both were not alike complaints of the Constitution itself.

The Senator from Delaware told us, on Friday, that the democratic party is now in possession, and proposed to use its responsibility without any regard to the wishes of this side of the Chamber. We did not need his reminder. It is a most significant fact that the advent of that party to power is accompanied by the most serious attack ever made, through peaceful instrumentalities, on the life of the Republic. The first use of its power is an attempt to set at naught the methods provided by the Constitution for the expression of the will of the people in legislation, in order to make it easier hereafter to set at naught the constitutional expression of the same will at the polls in the election of President and Representatives.

Mr. President, in my judgment this novel and monstrous doctrine must be encountered, resisted, and overthrown on the threshold. To yield anything to it is to yield everything. The men who have set it up must abandon it here, or prepare themselves to defend it before the intelligent judgment of the American people, who know and understand their Constitution. Of the issue of such an appeal I have no fear.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has seen fit to deliver us a long, written, and carefully prepared speech upon an abstract proposition, a great portion of which was intended to be an attack upon a speech which I made at the close of the last session and upon one made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] who is not able to be in his seat. I am inclined to think, however, that the best part of the Senator's speech was the speeches that he read made by myself and the Senator from Ohio. The principal object of his speech now obviously is to endeavor to induce the President of the United States to veto what, if passed, will be clearly constitutional laws, as I can demonstrate when the proper time comes. He has seen fit to draw from English history what he calls parallels as to the conduct of Parliament in the last few years, forgetting all the time or concealing the fact that every English ministry is compelled to resign whenever want of confidence is voted against them by the House of Commons. New ministers have to take their places in the house at once, who will obey the popular will. That is not so here; it might save trouble if it was.

But I do not rise to debate the question. I think, in the absence of the Senator from Ohio, who was known to be sick, when the Senator from Massachusetts rose, since the attack was mainly made on him, that as he ought to be here when this subject is discussed, and as he is chairman of a committee charged with the examination of all these questions, I do not care to anticipate its action.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Kentucky will permit me to say that I did not know the Senator from Ohio was sick. I knew he was absent, or I observed he was not in his seat, but I informed him two or three days ago of my purpose to make this speech.

Mr. BECK. As he is chairman of a committee that is considering all these questions, and as we believe the democratic party will act wisely and properly, and present no laws to the President that he can, under any sort of legitimate exercise of his prerogative, veto——

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to understand him? To what committee does he refer as one of which the Senator from Ohio is chairman?

Mr. BECK. A democratic committee now considering how it is best for this side of the House who have the responsibility to act to determine how we can best present the measures fairly and properly.

Mr. CONKLING. Not a committee of the Senate?

Mr. BECK. No, sir; not a committee of the Senate as such.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BECK. But a committee that I believe will present legislation that Congress and the country will approve and indorse; when that committee does act and those bills are up for consideration, then we will discuss all these questions to the satisfaction of gentlemen on the other side, we hope. In the mean time, this resolution has been thrown in by the stalwart republicans simply for the purpose of stiffening the President in his reported threat (and it is an indecent threat if he made it) that he would veto legislation that had not been laid before him. General Grant, in 1874, said no President could intimate that he would do such a thing in advance, and that as a member of Congress he would resent it because it was indecent to do it. It will be time enough for him when the bills are sent to him, and for his friends, to threaten us with vetoes. They can withhold their threats for a few days without detriment to the public interest.

As I said, these bills are being carefully prepared. They will be up in a few days, as soon as the committees of the House can be appointed, and then, not for the naked purpose of exciting the President or for the purpose of exciting the country by abstract debate, the questions can come up on the merits of the bills as presented, and whatever is done by the democratic party will be defended, I think to the satisfaction of the country.

Therefore, as this resolution and speech has been, as I think, flung in improperly, in the absence of the gentleman who we recognize as having more to do with the preparation of the bills than anybody else—I mean the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN]—and as his former speech has been attacked behind his back, I move that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The Senator from Kentucky moves to lay the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts on the table.

Mr. WALLACE. Pending that motion, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment before either motion is put. I wish it to be distinctly understood that it is the first time, I think, in the history of the Senate——

Mr. WALLACE. I object to any debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. WALLACE. My motion takes precedence. I insist upon it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Pennsylvania objects to any debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the gag is to be applied in this way for the first time in the Senate, I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to object to any debate?

Several SENATORS. Order!

Mr. WALLACE. The motion of the Senator from Kentucky is not a debatable one.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask the Senator from Kentucky to withdraw that undebatable motion that we may have debate.

Mr. BECK. I decline to withdraw it. The question has been argued in the absence of the gentleman mainly in charge, and I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Is it in order to move to go into executive session?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not.

Mr. BLAINE. If we are to have a previous question in the Senate under the form of a motion to adjourn, then I will not——

Mr. McDONALD. I call for the enforcement of the rules.

Mr. BECK. I object to anything out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are called for on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when his name was called.) I was paired yesterday with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] on account of his illness. As he is still ill, because I see he is not here, I shall consider the pair as continuing. So I decline to vote. I should vote against this adjournment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to the Senator from Vermont that I saw the Senator from Ohio last night, and he said he would be obliged to the Senator for continuing the pair until he got out, to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He will never get out at the rate things are going now. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGALLS, (when Mr. PLUMB's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. PLUMB] requested me to state that he was paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. VANCE, (when Mr. RANSOM's name was called.) I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] My colleague if present would vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON, (after having voted in the negative.) I voted inadvertently, forgetting for the moment that I was paired for the day with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] I desire to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be withdrawn.

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 37, nays 28; as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, March 25, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

DELEGATES SWORN.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the credentials of Mr. Stephen W. Downey, Delegate from Wyoming Territory, and ask that he be sworn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised there is another Delegate present who has not yet been sworn. The Delegate from Idaho will be kind enough to come forward.

Mr. STEPHEN W. DOWNEY, Delegate from Wyoming, and Mr. GEORGE AINSLIE, Delegate from Idaho, presented themselves and qualified by taking the oath of office prescribed in section 1756 of the Revised Statutes.

JUDGE ALEXANDER RIVES.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask unanimous consent to offer for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed, the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk. I think there will be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Alexander Rives, judge of the district court of the United States for the western district of Virginia, is instructing the grand juries in said court to indict the several judges of the county courts of the State of Virginia, residing and holding State courts according to and under the laws of Virginia in said district, for the failure of said judges to place upon the jury panel of said State the names of colored persons; and

Whereas many of such judges have been indicted and arrested, so as greatly to interfere with the due administration of justice and the execution of the laws of said State: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed, shall inquire into the facts herein referred to, and report what action, if any, this House ought to take to prevent the further interference by said Judge Rives with the due administration of justice in the State of Virginia by the means aforesaid.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. FROST. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to repeal section 7 of an act approved March 1, 1879, relating to internal revenue.

Mr. CONGER. I am compelled to make objection.

AMENDMENT OF CONSTITUTION.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent, especially of my friend from Michigan, to introduce the joint resolution which I send to the desk and to have it printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution, as follows:

A joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. I think that had better be postponed awhile. I object.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the gentleman to allow the joint resolution to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not know that the gentleman from Michigan has the right to stop the introduction of bills and resolutions by an objection. The House has not yet adopted any rules, and as I understand we are now under general parliamentary law.

The SPEAKER. The rules provide when the introduction of bills is in order; and that is on Monday.

Mr. REAGAN. But those rules have not been adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read Rule 147.

Mr. ELAM. But the gentleman from Texas makes the point that we have no rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause it to be read.

The Clerk read Rule 147, as follows:

These rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congresses unless otherwise ordered.—March 19, 1860.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. THOMPSON. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the undistributed books and documents remaining in the folding-room of the House of Representatives to the credit of the members and officers of the last House of Representatives be placed to the credit of the corresponding members and officers of the present House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to hear the resolution read again.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that on the 19th instant the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] introduced a resolution on this subject. That resolution came in by unanimous consent and is pending, and this proposition would be in the nature of an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to the resolution if it be amended so as to provide that where no election has taken place the outgoing member may continue to control the distribution of documents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time?

Mr. NEAL, Mr. DUNNELL, and other members objected.

FRANK LOGSDON.

Mr. GEDDES. I desire to introduce a bill granting a pension to Frank Logsdon, late a private in Company K, Forty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. CONGER. I object. I must object to the introduction of any bills except those which relate to appropriations.

SPECIAL COMMITTEES.

Mr. COX. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk relating to the organization of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That special committees be appointed on the following subjects, to wit: one on the census, one on reform in the civil service, one on the state of the law respecting the ascertainment and declaration of result of election of President and Vice-President, and one upon the yellow-fever epidemic; said committees to have the same number of members, duties, scope, privileges, and powers as those on similar subjects of the last Congress.

Mr. COX. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CONGER. I object to its introduction.

Mr. KNOTT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being put on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 102, noes 71.

Mr. BREWER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 46 members voting therefor; more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 129, nays 111, not voting 46; as follows:

SENATE EMPLOYES.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I submit a resolution which I ask may be read for information and printed.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table and be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, directed to take into consideration, with the view to economy and the equalization of salaries upon the principles of justice, the question of the duties, number, and compensation of the employés of the Senate, and to report thereon by bill or otherwise; said committee to have leave to sit during the recess.

CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the select committee to take into consideration the state of the laws respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the result of the elections of the President and Vice-President of the United States be authorized to employ a clerk at the per diem salary paid other committee clerks of the Senate; and the necessary expenses of said committee be paid out of "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resolution?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no objection to my friend's resolution; but there is a rule of the Senate which requires that resolutions for expenses coming out of the contingent fund of the Senate in any manner shall be first referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I desire, as far as I can, to have that rule obeyed. In this case it is probably only a form, yet it is very well to have it referred to that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution goes there under the rule if the Senator makes an objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not make the point in the form of an objection. I do not object to the resolution itself.

Mr. MORGAN. I will remind the Senator that there is no account presented here for reference to that committee. It is a resolution authorizing the select committee to have a clerk as a means of completing its organization. Of course I have no objection to the resolution going to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses, although the reference is not necessary in my opinion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will state to my friend from Alabama that the rule requires that any item of expense which is to come out of the contingent fund of the Senate, no matter what it is, must come under the review of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Then every resolution which has been passed at this session appointing a committee, that committee having a clerk, under the rules of the Senate ought to have had a like reference. I am quite willing the Senator should make an exception in this case if he thinks that the select committee named should exist without a clerk.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Allow me to say to my friend that I said I supposed the resolution was right, that I was probably friendly to it, but in order that the rule of the Senate might be carried out I selected this as a case to give notice that such was the rule of the Senate, and that I hoped it would be obeyed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will have the rule reported if the Senator from Alabama desires.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good; let it be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The rule creating the committees of the Senate has this provision:

A Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to consist of three Senators, to which shall be referred all resolutions directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or creating a charge upon the same.

The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Alabama to the last clause of the rule. The suggestion of the Senator from West Virginia is clearly in order. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It must be.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further business for the morning hour? If not, the Secretary will report the calendar of resolutions and concurrent resolutions in their order.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no.

Mr. MORRILL. Will not the Senator from Maryland move for an executive session instead?

Mr. WHYTE. I have no objection to moving an executive session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 38, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—38.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 26, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. J. N. DAVIS, of Maryland.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I ask unanimous consent to present a bill and have it printed and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, when appointed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of submitting a motion to the House, but before I do so I desire to state that I think it very probable that on to-morrow morning either one or the other of the appropriation bills, or perhaps both, may be introduced.

Mr. GARFIELD. We cannot hear the gentleman.

Mr. ATKINS. I repeat that I rise for the purpose of submitting a motion to the House, but before submitting that motion I desire to state that I think it probable that on to-morrow morning either the one or the other of the lost appropriation bills—those that failed to pass in the last session—will be introduced, or perhaps both. The motion that I intend to submit is that the House adjourn, and the reason why I make that motion is this: the democratic members and democratic Senators desire to have a conference on these appropriation bills—I state it frankly—and to have an opportunity of holding this conference to-day instead of this evening.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me before he makes his motion——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. ATKINS. I do.

Mr. GARFIELD. We are anxious on this side of the House to get forward with the special business for which we have been called together, but are not disposed to restrict any proper time that may be needed for consultation. It does seem to us that now, in the second week of this session, we ought to be able to get at the appropriation bills, especially as they were in form and printed and were before us only a few weeks ago. Still if the gentleman believes that by to-morrow morning those bills can be introduced——

Mr. ATKINS. I feel very confident of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I for one do not feel like hindering his motion. I think, however, that some propositions in relation to the amendment of the rules and concerning the business of the House might now be introduced and referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ATKINS. I will state that there has been an informal understanding between a portion of the democratic members of the House and some of the democratic Senators that the conference to-day shall take place at one o'clock. If there should be any discussion which would extend the session of the House to-day beyond that time, it might be a disappointment to some of our democratic friends in the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I only ask that the resolutions which I refer to be introduced for reference.

Mr. ATKINS. While I am on the floor——

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman can retain the floor for such time as he desires.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask leave to introduce the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the joint resolution to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879.

The joint resolution provides that the clause in the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880 and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1879, making appropriations to pay B. R. Lewis and J. J. Coffee the balance due them respectively as marshal and clerk of the consulate-general at Shanghai, China, be amended by striking out the words "and said Lewis and Coffee shall receive no allowance for witness fees and traveling expenses:" and that the following clause in said bill in relation to the publication of the geological survey, namely, the words, "under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $100,000," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. GARFIELD. If that joint resolution is in the line of correcting an appropriation bill, let it be referred to the Committee of the Whole rather than to act on it now.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879, was received, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

SPECIAL COMMITTEES.

Mr. COX. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That special committees be appointed on the following subjects, to-wit: one on the census, one on reform in the civil service, one on the state of the law respecting the ascertainment and declaration of result of election of President and Vice-President, and one upon the yellow-fever epidemic; said committees to have the same number of members, duties, scope, privileges, and powers as those on similar subjects of the last Congress.

Mr. COX. I simply move to refer that to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to state the object of the committee respecting the ascertainment and declaration of result of election of President and Vice-President.

Mr. COX. The object of the resolution is to enable the Speaker to make up the committees intelligently. He wants all the committees to be authorized by the House that are to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. That is not my point. I speak of the committee to ascertain the result of the election of President and Vice-President. What committee is that?

Mr. COX. It is the committee of which Mr. Southard was chairman.

Mr. CONGER. It is not a renewal of the Potter committee?

Mr. COX. Oh, no; it is the committee of which Mr. Southard was chairman as to the electoral count.

Mr. GARFIELD. In relation to the future?

Mr. COX. That is all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that a similar committee has been appointed by the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. It is not, then, a revival of the Potter committee?

Mr. COX. Oh, no; we have had enough of that.

Mr. KILLINGER. I would suggest that there is no necessity for a committee on reform in the civil service.

Mr. COX. I will ask my friend from Pennsylvania to consent that the resolution as it is shall go to the Committee on Rules. I want to have it referred there; that is all.

Mr. KILLINGER. Is the gentleman from New York on the Committee on Rules?

Mr. COX. I am not.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

BUSINESS OF THE EXTRA SESSION.

Mr. FRYE. I offer for reference to the Committee on Rules the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the necessity of this special session of the Forty-sixth Congress has been occasioned by the failure of the last Congress to make appropriations for the support of the Army and for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year; and

Whereas the business of this country and the welfare of the people demand "rest and peace" from legislation: Therefore it is

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to report forthwith a rule providing that no bills or joint resolutions except those for the aforesaid purposes shall be reported at this special session from any committee or considered by this House.

Mr. REAGAN. I object to that.

Mr. EWING. I also object.

Mr. FRYE. I ask to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Maine, it appears to me, has the right to move the reference of the resolution.

Mr. EWING. I object to its being introduced for reference.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not think the gentleman has a right to object.

Mr. CONGER. If that is objected to, I must renew my objection to the resolution of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] has the right to object. The Chair thinks the course indicated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] to object to everything would include the right of the gentleman from Ohio to object for a similar reason.

Mr. CONGER. I objected yesterday upon the general view that I should object on behalf of my friends on this side of the House to everything that did not tend to the passage of the appropriation bills. But on the statement to-day that some matters should be referred to the Committee on Rules relating to the organization of the House, and when the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] stood with his resolution in his hand and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] with another I supposed it was agreed by common consent that those two resolutions should be presented and referred to the Committee on Rules, and therefore I did not renew the objection which I made yesterday to the reference of the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] if he objects to the mere reference of a proposition to amend the rules? I desire to offer for reference a resolution to amend a rule.

Mr. CONGER. The objection comes from the gentleman's own side of the House. He should talk on that subject to the gentleman with whom he stands in intimate relations.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to offer for reference to the Committee on Rules a resolution to amend Rule 101.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman had better wait till the point now pending is settled.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. CONGER. It is not time yet to object. We want to have the other point decided.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. CONGER. I ask for a decision upon the objection to the other proposition.

Mr. REAGAN. I objected to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine because it is not an amendment of the permanent rules. It is to prevent action on all matters except appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always ruled that on Monday, under the call of States for bills and resolutions, resolutions for the amendment of the rules are in order to be introduced for reference to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. The proposition of the gentleman from Maine is a proposition to make a special rule of this House for this session, and it is just as much an amendment to the rules as any of the propositions that have been offered on the other side; and it seems to me, as a matter of ordinary fairness, if we allow one of two propositions to be introduced for reference to the Committee on Rules, the other should also be allowed to come in.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair has already stated, the resolution would be in order on Monday; and in addition the Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that if the rules were under consideration, then the proposition would be in order as an amendment thereto. But these matters to-day come in by unanimous consent, and can only be referred by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was not addressing myself so much to the Chair as to the sense of fair play of the gentlemen who objected, because on the understanding that the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Rules would be allowed we permitted the other to pass without objection.

The SPEAKER. On the subject of fair play the Chair desires to state he will see complete fairness is had by both sides. He will also state that when these propositions come to be reported from the Committee on Rules amendments will be in order.

Mr. CONGER. As I understand, the objection to the resolution of the gentleman from Maine is insisted on. I therefore renew my objection to the introduction of the resolution of the gentlemen from New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. CONGER. I state to the Chair it was only on the condition that two or three gentlemen should be permitted to offer for reference resolutions of which I had cognizance for the amendment of the rules, one of whom, the gentleman from Maine, was already standing in his place to offer such an amendment, and the statement of the Chair that the reference would be made—it was only upon that condition that the reference of the resolution of the gentleman from New York was permitted to pass. And I stated in some way that that was the design of gentlemen on my side and my own. We proceeded on some understanding of that kind—I do not know how it arose—and I call upon the Chair to correct the error into which we fell.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio introduced the subject-matters to the House.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair assented to the proposition. Now the Chair is well aware I am not in the habit of yielding a point I have commenced upon, unless by some arrangement satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not remember that the gentleman made any condition.

Mr. CONGER. I made objection to this the other day, and on my objection it was ruled out. I stated yesterday in my place that I should object to all propositions which were offered in this House unless under the rules, excepting the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was of the opinion that from the statement of the gentleman from Ohio there had been a change of judgment on the left side of the House in respect to all these matters.

Mr. CONGER. Only so far that both sets of resolutions should go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Chair will allow me a moment. Just before I rose to make the suggestion, the gentleman from New York came to my seat soliciting that he be allowed without objection to introduce his proposition.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say concerning the objection that I made——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is addressing the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I consulted with the gentleman from Maine and other gentlemen on our side of the House, and we were desirous, if anything were introduced, that proposition of his should be also introduced. I said to the gentleman from New York, "The gentleman from Maine has a proposition to refer to the Committee on Rules; you introduce yours and he his, and I think there will be no objection."

Mr. COX. And I made no objection to it.

Mr. REAGAN. Now I desire to say a word.

Mr. GARFIELD. So the understanding on this side was that by unanimous consent both propositions should be allowed to come in for reference to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COX. I made no condition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know that you did not.

Mr. REAGAN. I made objection because the object of the resolution might be reached by a simple resolution offered for the adoption of the House, and because under cover of an amendment to the rules of the House it is proposed to abridge the power of the House to act during the present session upon any other than the subjects indicated, or, in other words, to limit the action of this House to two bills. A good deal of the time during the passage of these appropriation bills, when they are in the Senate and before the President for his signature, we would be left here, if such a proposition as that of the gentleman from Maine were adopted, with our arms folded, incapable of doing anything when there are public measures we could take up and consider. There is no reason why we should not proceed with the consideration of important public business when the appropriation bills have passed from the House and gone to the Senate or are before the President for his signature. I do not wish such a resolution as this of the gentleman from Maine adopted, and certainly I do not wish any such action on the part of the House reached by indirection and under the guise of an amendment to the rules of the House.

I do not object to any resolution proposing to amend the permanent rules of the House going to the Committee on Rules. I only object to the present resolution offered by the gentleman from Maine because in my judgment it is an effort by indirection to control the action of this House which could be done as well by a resolution.

Mr. FRYE. I give notice, then, Mr. Speaker, that on Monday next I will submit this resolution for the consideration of the House, and I now ask that my name be entered upon the list to make the motion to suspend the rules and pass it.

Mr. ATKINS. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. COX. And I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. ATKINS. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to reconsider the vote by which the House allowed the gentleman from New York to refer to the Committee on Rules certain changes as indicated in his resolution, and the gentleman from New York moves that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. CONGER. And I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay upon the table.

The SPEAKER. Pending which, the gentleman from Tennessee moves the House adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to have the yeas and nays ordered before the adjournment.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is always in order.

Mr. CONGER. But this is part of my motion which I am still upon the floor to make.

The SPEAKER. Surely the gentleman will not assert the Chair is bound to recognize the demand for the yeas and nays when another motion of a higher privilege is made.

Mr. CONGER. But I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the demand for the yeas and nays, but pending that demand the gentleman from Tennessee moves the House adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. Then on the motion to adjourn I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 134, nays 110, not voting 42; as follows:

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WALLACE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT put the question on the motion, and declared that the ayes prevailed and that the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR (in his seat) called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PADDOCK. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. The yeas and nays are demanded on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. COCKRELL. Were they demanded before the decision of the Chair?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not hear the call. The Senator says he made the call.

Mr. HOAR. I made the call in season; I made it cotemporaneously.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts says he made the call in season. The Chair did not hear him. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary called the roll.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that my colleague, [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.]

Mr. MCMILLAN, (after having voted "nay.") I observe that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is not in his seat. I am paired with the Senator until Monday if he should be absent. I voted inadvertently, and ask to withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's vote will be withdrawn.

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further business for the morning hour? The Chair hears none; and the Secretary will call the Calendar of resolutions and concurrent resolutions in their order.

The Secretary read the first resolution on the Calendar, being the one submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 20th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the refusal by one House of Congress to make necessary provision for the support of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, and for the defense of the country, except upon condition that the other House and the President shall give their assent to legislation which they disapprove, and the refusal by Congress to make such provision except upon condition that the President shall give such assent, are unconstitutional, revolutionary, and if persisted in must lead to the overthrow of constitutional government and the destruction of the national life.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate agree to this resolution?

Mr. BAYARD. I shall ask the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to withdraw his motion to lay the resolution on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion was spent with the day.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no right to say anything further, the motion being not debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no need for the Senator from Kentucky to withdraw the motion. The motion fell with the day. A motion to lay on the table ends with the day.

Mr. BECK. I desire only to say that I made the motion agreeing that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] should submit a motion to adjourn, my intention being to withdraw the motion to lay on the table the moment the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who was then sick and who was referred to quite frequently in the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] was able to be in his seat. I have no desire to impose any previous question on the Senate. I have no desire to cut off debate. If there be any persons in the Senate who are anxious for full and free debate, I think I am one of those Senators. I desired that we should have no debate at the time, especially as the Senator from Massachusetts said he was not aware that the Senator from Ohio was sick, and I made the motion in order to give the Senator from Ohio time to be heard. That was the only object I had in view, and I will withdraw the motion at any moment, and always intended to do so when the Senator from Ohio could be here.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to say that under no circumstances and in no shape or form do I ever desire to see such a rule as that of the previous question established or recognized in the Senate of the United States; and for that reason it was with some regret that I heard my honorable friend from Kentucky move to lay the resolution of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts on the table, because that was a non-debatable question, and discussion therefore was stopped. I am glad that the motion has been withdrawn, so that if anything further is to be said upon the resolution, it may be said in the discretion of any Senator.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understood that the motion to lay on the table was made on account of the absence of the Senator who had the matter in charge.

Mr. BAYARD. I never heard that any Senator had the matter in charge except the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. ANTHONY. The inquiry was made by the Senator from New York, I think, as to who had the matter in charge, and he was told that the Senator from Ohio had it in charge as the chairman of a subcommittee of the joint committee of the democratic caucus. I would make the parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President, if it would be in order to refer this resolution to the democratic caucus, which seems to have charge of the matter? [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. That is the right place for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. I have no hesitation in saying that one reason why I desired to lay the resolution on the table in the absence of the Senator from Ohio was that he was the chairman of a committee appointed by the democratic party to look into the question of how it was best to present all these questions. I hoped he would find some solution of it, and in order to give him time to do so I desired to delay the matter until he came in. It was not a parliamentary committee; but I take it for granted that when either party has a majority in the Senate, and that majority is charged with the responsibility of the legislation of the body, it is well that they should have time to perfect the measures they are to bring in, that they may present them in a way that is best for the country and the Senate. Believing that, and perhaps not having as much care for diplomacy as I ought to have had, I frankly said, and I again say, that that was the object I had in making the motion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I perhaps ought to state to the Senate that I was not aware when I introduced this resolution or when I addressed the Senate upon it that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] was ill or was absent from the Senate. I observed that he was not in his seat when I rose to speak; but it is frequently the case with the members of that very laborious committee of which he is chairman that they are employed about the Capitol or in their committee-room during the sessions of the Senate and come into the Chamber when matters of interest come up, and that has been very much the habit of that Senator, as is well known.

I was not aware that the Senator from Ohio had any peculiar relation to this subject. The Senator from Kentucky made to the Senate a very important and interesting statement, upon which I commented; and I extracted as a text verbatim a great many sentences from a speech of the Senator from Kentucky, who was present and is now present. The Senator from Ohio, it is true, in the course of the debate which ensued upon the statement of the Senator from Kentucky in the closing hours of the last Congress, made a speech to which I called attention; and meeting the Senator from Ohio in the cars the other day I said to him, half in jest, but, the Senator from Kentucky will agree, with great truth, that I was about to make a speech and that I found I did quite as well making extracts from a speech of his as with my original matter. We had some discussion together on the general subject, but I did not intend that as a notice to the Senator from Ohio, but it was a mere accident that I made the communication to him.

I ought to state further that the day before I addressed the Senate I gave notice in full Senate that it was my purpose to address the body at the close of the morning hour the following day on this subject.

Mr. BECK. The reason I supposed at the time the Senator from Massachusetts was advised of the fact of the illness of the Senator from Ohio was that the evening before a very important question, or one supposed to be very important, was taken by yeas and nays, and the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] as the RECORD shows, announced that he was paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who was absent and ill. That escaped the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts no doubt; but having seen that in the RECORD, of course I assumed that it was known to all the Senators.

As to the reference to the speech I made, I only desire to say that when the bills come, as they will come, from the other House, and all these questions are up that were alluded to in the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, I expect to be heard, and perhaps heard quite fully. I can afford to wait until that time to reply to any references to what I may have said. It will be very hard to make any person believe that I have any revolutionary tendency; I have thought I was perhaps leaning too much the other way; but that will be discussed when the proper time comes, and I do not desire now, in anticipation of the bills we know are coming before us, to enter into that debate. Therefore I am content to wait until the bills come, when, I now say, I expect to be heard in answer quite fully to the speech made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, will the Senate agree to the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. EATON. If any Senator desires to be heard on that resolution I will not make the motion I shall otherwise make, I shall vote against that resolution at some time during this session after giving my reasons for that vote; but unless some Senator desires to be heard, I shall move that the resolution lie upon the table. I will not make the motion if any gentleman desires to be heard.

I am requested to state that I understand the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] will be able to be in his seat on Monday, and if he chooses then to address the Senate upon the subject he will have an opportunity. Unless some Senator wishes to make remarks now, I move that the resolution lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the resolution lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EATON. I hope the yeas and nays will not be ordered. I wish it to lie on the table for the present, because no Senator desires to discuss it, not to carry it upon the table for any other purpose.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Connecticut moves to postpone until Monday next on the ground of the desire of the Senator from Ohio, who is now ill——

Mr. EATON. No, I do not make that motion; I take my own course, that is, that it lie on the table for the present. I will withdraw the motion now if any gentleman desires to discuss it. Certainly there is no capital to be made out of this matter. I shall meet the question when the time arrives.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know that anybody desires to discuss it now, but some comment was made the other day upon a statement which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] made on the floor. It is worth while merely to signalize the fact that for the first time I think in the history of Congress, so far as I know anything of it, notification was served that debate in the Senate upon a proposition before it must wait until a caucus committee of the dominant party had come to some conclusion. The Senator from Kentucky distinctly advised us that that caucus committee, composed of members of both branches, was preparing legislation to be initiated in the House of Representatives, and that, therefore, the Senate upon a proposition already before it must wait until a caucus composed of members of both branches had prepared legislation to be introduced in the House, and after running the gauntlet of a joint caucus and of the House of Representatives it might please the majority to suspend the motion to lay on the table and give Senators on this side an opportunity to discuss the question.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Maine was not in his seat when I made my statement a few moments ago, and I am not disposed to go into a wrangle with him this morning. I have said already and admitted already for what it is worth all that the Senator has said.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not know that.

Mr. BECK. He was not in. I have said also that when the bills do come, as they will come, and the questions are up in the form in which they can be considered as legislation, I expect to be quite fully heard upon all these subjects; and I will endeavor to defend the speech which I made so far as it may be defensible when the time comes. Until then, I do not propose to go into the matter.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Kentucky, I understand, then admits that he cannot be heard, and that there is no propriety in his being heard until the caucus committee of the dominant party has shaped the legislation into the exact form that they want it submitted here; that outside and beyond the committees and the organized forms of legislation which have prevailed in this Government so far, there is a sort of committee of safety organized to supervise and overlook the legislative proceedings of both branches. If the Senator from Kentucky admits that, that is enough.

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is full opportunity to be heard this morning. We are perfectly willing to hear the Senator from Maine for an hour and a half or two hours.

Mr. BLAINE. I will inform the Senator from Delaware that certainly after the exhaustive speech of the Senator from Massachusetts nothing need be said on the subject on this side of the Chamber. We were only calling attention to the fact that this was a new departure in legislation; that a sort of committee of safety, for the meeting of which both branches are adjourned at premature hours in an unprecedented manner, is in existence, preparing, devising, and directing the measures of both bodies—a sort of extra-legislative and extra-constitutional proceeding, which it is merely worth while to note for future reference. That is all I want to say.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This debate proceeds by unanimous consent. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BECK. I will not occupy over a minute or two of the time of the Senate. The Senator from Maine forgets that this resolution was not legislation, did not look to legislation. It is a mere declaration of opinion. Legislation, we all know, will be presented to this body. We were called together for the purpose of acting upon important questions of legislation; and I repeat that I regard it as the duty of the majority, when they desire to present legislation, to present it cautiously and carefully; and not knowing how it would be presented, and being quite a new member in this body, and not desiring to endeavor to anticipate what might be the action of the majority as to the legislation which might come before the body, I declined, notwithstanding the allusion made to me by the Senator from Massachusetts, to go into discussion on a political—I was about to say conundrum—but I will say upon a sentimental problem when I knew it would amount to nothing when the legislation comes. The Senator from Maine can very readily see that I might as an individual member of the Senate have expressed views that might or might not accord with those of the great majority of the party with whom I act, and I do not desire to assume that I have the right to take a position for them.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understand the honorable Senator to say that he will not venture on the expression of an individual opinion on any great question until the caucus has determined what the will of the majority party is.

Mr. BECK. I have perhaps as much individual opinion as I ought to have, and perhaps a little more; but I do not choose to go into this wrangle now, but by the time we get to the discussion of the question, when the bills are before us, I think there will be time enough for discussion.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought the discussion came after the bills were before us. The Senator says when we get through with the discussion on the bills before us.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no; I did not.

Mr. BLAINE. Those are the honorable Senator's words, if I heard them aright.

Mr. BECK. No; I said when the bills are before us for discussion.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I misapprehended the honorable Senator, because I had always supposed that committees prepared and the open session of the Senate discussed; but I think the honorable Senator will observe that the thing is about to be reversed now; that we are waiting now for somebody unknown to the Constitution, unknown to the organization of both branches, to prepare legislation which is to be taken, swallowed whole, and which members on that side do not propose even to discuss until the edict of King Caucus has determined what shall be forced through both branches of Congress.

Mr. BECK. I have repeated before, and I now repeat for the last time, that I will not be drawn into any wrangle about this question. I declined so far as I was concerned to enter into any discussion until there was some legitimate subject-matter of legislation before the Senate. I said this morning, and I repeat, that when that legislation is before us I will discuss it as well as I am able, and whether King Caucus or any other king is called, I shall endeavor to do what is best for the American people and to vote what I think is best for their interests. I admit, for what it is worth, that men who think and look at questions wisely and well are considering how the measure may best be brought up, and until that is done I do not intend to anticipate their action.

Mr. BLAINE. If the morning journals are to be credited, the legislation has all been prepared; it has been matured in a joint caucus. The exact form, the precise amendment, the phrases in which it shall be expressed, have all been arranged.

I desire to say again that this is new; hitherto quite unknown in this Capitol. I have been some time in Congress, and the Senator from Kentucky professes a little bit of modesty on the subject for which there is no call. He has been here a long time and is an experienced legislator. I think he will admit that it is a new thing. I have never known in the dominant party to which I have belonged a measure matured, discussed, and prepared to be thrust upon either branch at the dictation of a caucus, and still less have I ever known that a joint caucus of both branches——

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if he knows anything about the preparation of the resumption act, where it was prepared?

Mr. BLAINE. I certainly do not. I certainly never was in any caucus that prepared it. I know very well there was no joint caucus to prepare it.

Mr. McDONALD. It was said to have been prepared in the caucus of the republican Senators.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no knowledge of that whatever. At all events I know there was no joint caucus upon it. It came to the House from the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. It was reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLAINE. Reported, says the honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] who is still a member of the Committee on Finance, by that committee regularly.

Mr. McDONALD. But reported to that committee from a republican caucus.

Mr. BLAINE. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Iowa would not like to say that.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the opposite side will not be able to find any precedent for this new departure.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask most respectfully how often must a Senator be recognized by the Chair in order to be entitled to address it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Delaware, but supposed he yielded to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BAYARD. I have been trying to obtain the floor ever since the recognition of the Chair, but have been kept from it by disorderly interruptions.

Mr. President, the matter I desire to ask——

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Delaware permit me to say to him that we do not hear him on this side of the Chamber as we should be glad to do?

Mr. BAYARD. I will endeavor to speak louder. The question now is as to the disposition to be made of the resolution offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and by him debated on the day before yesterday. For some reason, I know not what, he has affixed a peculiar relation of the honorable Senator from Ohio, now absent by reason of sickness, to that resolution. I do not know whether the Senator from Ohio ever read the resolution or not; but I know, however, that he was absent from the Chamber before the debate began, and that the fact of the cause of his absence was made known twice and announced in the Senate, but not it seems to the ear of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. The debate that followed on that resolution was founded, it seems, on expressions used by the honorable Senator from Ohio in a debate that occurred during the last session of Congress, and the Senator from Massachusetts, in his own way and according to his own ideas, proceeded to reply to certain propositions of law laid down by the honorable Senator from Ohio. He chose extracts from the Senator's debate of the last session, and he proceeded to reply to them with more or less satisfaction to himself and his associates; but that reply, with the fact that his speech was to be made the subject of discussion, it was not within the power of the Senator from Ohio to control. He could have no connection with that which had no existence,—no existence since he was ill and in his bed and unable to attend.

Therefore I suppose that when it was suggested that the debate on the honorable Senator's resolution should go over until the Senator from Ohio should appear, that suggestion was based on the fact that his remarks had been deemed worthy of criticism by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and that he therefore should have an opportunity, if he desired it, of replying to what had been said. It was just that, and no more. There was no connection in any way between the honorable Senator from Ohio and the resolution offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, except that it was created by the manner of statement and discussion of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts involving opinions heretofore expressed by his colleague from Ohio. That was all.

Something has been said in relation to awaiting the dictation or suggestion of somebody unknown to the rules of the Senate or to the rules of the House. I have been longer a member of the Senate than the honorable Senator from Maine, and, therefore, my experience has shown me, not upon one occasion but upon almost countless occasions, adjournments of this body without regard to the wishes of the minority for the purpose of party consultations of his political associates, and I have seen time and again measures of the gravest importance brought into the body, put upon the table, announced to be put upon their passage, and the minority called upon to debate them and told that when they were tired then the vote would be called, but not an amendment should be allowed, not an i should be dotted or a t crossed, or a word said in defense or explanation or in reply by any one of the vast majority of the party then dominant, with whom the honorable Senator from Maine is now associated.

So there was nothing unusual in the fact that an adjournment of the Senate should take place for the purpose of conference and consultation among the members of the party to whom was committed the responsibility of controlling the business of the body; what order it should take, in what order measures should or should not be introduced, was a matter of consultation for the orderly and expeditious transaction of business.

But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator has spoken of King Caucus. King Caucus was the king of his party. The king of ours is the Constitution of the United States. No caucus can bind, and no agreement of caucus ever was proposed to bind the consciences of the democratic party acting in their free consultation and conference with each other. We have a king who guides us in this Chamber and out of it, and that is the Constitution of the country, and no power unknown to it.

Mr. BLAINE. There was one point in the honorable Senator's remarks which I cannot understand; that is, how a majority party could bring in a measure here and put it through without permitting the minority to debate it.

Mr. BAYARD. Oh no; I said put it through without debating it themselves, simply throwing it upon the table and saying "this shall become a measure."

Mr. BLAINE. That is an altogether different case.

Mr. BAYARD. It did alter the state of the case amazingly.

Mr. BLAINE. It did not prevent your side debating it. Did you want to force this side to debate it?

Mr. BAYARD. Not at all, and the honorable Senator will never find my vote being given to stop any man from the free expression of his opinion on any measure.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the honorable Senator voted to adjourn the other day to cut off debate summarily.

Mr. BAYARD. Because the non-adjournment of the body was not necessary for the discussion of this resolution. A discussion may take place as well to-day as yesterday. It was the convenience of the majority to adjourn, and it was their right to exercise that convenience.

Mr. BLAINE. The first motion that the majority thought their convenience required was to lay the resolution on the table, and then somebody suggested that a better motion would be to adjourn. The adjournment was an after-thought.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator was not in the Chamber this morning when I rose and requested my honorable friend from Kentucky to withdraw the motion to lay this resolution on the table, simply because it looked like, or it might have been supposed to be, a desire to check debate; and for fear that such a construction would be given or that such an effect would follow, I desired that the freest opportunity for any gentleman on either side who desired to debate that abstract question should be had; and that motion therefore was withdrawn.

The question is now whether a speech having been made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts in criticism of a speech made at the last session by the honorable Senator from Ohio, it is well that for the present the resolution go by, that the gentleman whose opinions have been so ably criticised should, if he desires, have an opportunity to reply. That was all. I do not know whether he wants to reply or not; I do not know what his judgment is upon that; but if he desires to reply then the debate may just be as free as air, the honorable Senator from Maine or Massachusetts or any other State can debate the question.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator from Delaware then took forty-eight hours to make up his mind.

Mr. BAYARD. No, I did not.

Mr. BLAINE. Forty-eight hours to make up his mind that the motion to lay on the table was not a proper thing to be done?

Mr. BAYARD. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me recount the circumstances: The hour of one had scarcely been passed, or but little after, when the Senator from Massachusetts concluded. There was no caucus awaiting the attendance of democratic Senators; there was nothing to do; the day was before us; but some manifestation of a desire to debate the question was met by the honorable Senator from Kentucky with a motion to lay on the table; which he refused, upon my request and the request of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] not now in his seat, to withdraw. Then the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] made a motion to adjourn, and the honorable Senator from Delaware voted for that, and now he comes in forty-eight hours afterward and is penetrated with the conviction that a motion to lay on the table was not a proper thing, that the minority side of the Senate wishing to debate at that time should have the opportunity, and having been two days deprived of it, the Senator shows his liberality by coming in now, when the thing is cold and the matter has gone by, to offer us an opportunity to debate.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. I have not got through, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. I had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator sat down when I took the floor. Was not that so, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine states the fact.

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. I merely say now that I would not withhold or limit debate; and after I have stated the fact as to my own action here, if there is to be anything like even an insinuation that that which I state is not to be accepted by my associates here as absolutely true——

Mr. BLAINE. What does the Senator refer to?

Mr. BAYARD. I mean this: He said it took me forty-eight hours to make up my mind, and then his suggestion is that I have changed my mind. I say to the Senator that my mind has not changed, that I was just as unwilling that debate should be shortened on the day before yesterday as I am to-day; but the day before yesterday I considered an adjournment proper and needful and voted for it then as I would to-day, but not for the purpose of shortening the debate upon this or any other question, but simply for the purpose of attending to those matters that I thought more proper to be attended to—that was all—just as much as to-day. We have already voted—I do not know whether with or without the vote of the honorable Senator from Maine—that when the Senate adjourns to-day it stand adjourned to meet on Monday. That is in the discretion of the majority.

Mr. BLAINE. I would have voted against it had I been here. I did not happen to be in the Chamber.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the Senator was not, but I merely refer to it by way of illustration. The adjournment the day before yesterday was made in the discretion of the gentlemen who voted for it. We believe to-day public business will be expedited by an adjournment until Monday, or there may be private reasons affecting gentlemen, I do not know what and I do not ask for them; but I do not think the honorable Senator from Maine is just to me or to himself in saying that I slumbered forty-eight hours and then came to a conclusion which I said I had had at the time of the adjournment the day before yesterday. I have not changed my view. My object was at that time, in part, that opportunity should be given to a Senator whose opinions had been assailed and criticised, peculiarly selected for criticism and in his absence, to reply if he desired to do so. That is one thing. I should have voted therefore that the matter lie over. I should so say in regard to the present disposition of the resolution, simply that it lie over. If the motion to lay upon the table for the present is looked upon as fatal to the resolution, I would rather it should not carry, for as long as debate is desired on this subject, let the gates be open. It is the discretion and the responsibility of any Senator to say how he will occupy the public time here. I protest against the imputation of the statement I made. I have made the statement as I thought very clear as to my reasons for voting the day before yesterday for the adjournment, and my regret that the Senator from Kentucky had made the motion at all. As a matter of fact, I did in passing by him at the time signify to him my regret that he made the motion. I think I signified that to him at the time, but that was a purely private remark as I passed by him at the moment. Whether I did or did not, the fact was the same that I approved the adjournment, but I did not desire to see the debate cut off.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. Allow me a word?

Mr. BLAINE. Very well.

Mr. BECK. I suppose the Senator from Maine does not desire to do any injustice to any action I may have taken, and therefore I wish to repeat now to him what I said before he came in, and which I have since heard controverted a few moments ago. Before I made the motion to lay on the table, I consulted with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] and others around me, and agreed that the motion to adjourn should be put before the motion to lay upon the table was pressed, and there was no suggestion from any Senator of a desire to speak until after the motion to adjourn was made, and I only made the motion to lay on the table for the purpose of seeing the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts in the RECORD the next morning in the hope that the Senator from Ohio might then be in his seat and able to reply to it. I was always ready to discuss it, and I went personally to the Senator from Maine yesterday and told him that having heard the Senator from Ohio was still ill I would withdraw the motion this morning. I repeat that before any desire to speak was evinced by any gentleman on the other side, by arrangement before I made the motion, and as a part of the motion in fact, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] agreed to move an adjournment, so that no vote should be taken upon my motion to lay on the table for fear it would cut off debate. That I stated before the Senator from Maine came in.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Delaware shows undue sensibility about a part of my statement, which was that on the day before yesterday he voted for a motion to restrict debate, and forty-eight hours afterward he came in and professed himself ready for the widest possible debate. That is all I stated. I made no imputation whatever of his motives, nor can I now see why the Senator from Kentucky should have made the motion to lay on the table at all if the motion to adjourn was about to be made, for that would have covered all the point necessary in suppressing debate.

One thing further and I am done with this. I have been in Congress some years; this is the fifth session I have served in the Senate, and I desire to say to the honorable Senator from Delaware that I have never known a measure matured or proposed to be matured or any suggestion of its being matured by a republican caucus.

Mr. BAYARD. I never was in one and I cannot tell. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator mean by that to do what he charged me with doing, insinuating that I am not stating what is exactly so?

Mr. BAYARD. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. BLAINE. Probably if the Senator had been in a republican caucus he would have been improved in reference to the matter now pending. [Laughter.] I say it never has been proposed in a republican caucus to mature a legislative measure. I never knew it in the fourteen years I was in the House of Representatives; and I repeat again that it is a new departure in the legislative history of this country when a joint caucus of the two Houses composed of the majority party get together and debate and mature and perfect measures, to the support of which every member on that side and every democratic member in the other end of the Capitol is practically pledged, before it is introduced before either branch.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask him whether or not the resolution offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] the other day was not discussed in a republican caucus?

Mr. BLAINE. In republican caucuses the order of business and the order of bills and the order in which measures shall come up is perpetually discussed, and that was all the point covered by the resolution of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. HEREFORD. No, it covered a good deal more than that, Mr. President.

Mr. BLAINE. What did it cover?

Mr. HEREFORD. The resolution can be read.

Mr. BLAINE. The resolution of the Senator from Vermont was that it was the judgment of this side of the Chamber that no legislation should be entered upon except that comprehended in the President's message and in his proclamation calling the extra session. That was all.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the Senator allow the resolution to be read?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to detain the Senate, but I have no objection to its being read.

Mr. HEREFORD. Then I understand the Senator admits that that very resolution was discussed in a republican caucus?

Mr. BLAINE. I will admit a great deal more. I will admit that republican caucuses time out of mind, and whig caucuses time out of mind, and old democratic caucuses time out of mind, did settle in caucus the order of business. That is a matter that is proper to be settled in caucus. But that is very different from settling the details of any particular measure. One is essential to the progress of legislation, the other is binding the views and consciences of men upon particular points of legislation by an outside power.

Mr. HEREFORD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, yes.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask whether or not the resolution introduced at the last session of Congress for the appointment of what is known as the Teller committee was not discussed before a republican caucus?

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; there was not a human being that ever knew that was to be introduced except myself when I sent it to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HEREFORD. Afterward, after it was introduced, was it not considered in a republican caucus?

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. As there is so much difference of opinion about what has taken place in these respective caucuses, would it not be better to send for the record of each? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think the point of this matter is not quite fairly stated by the honorable Senator from Delaware, and that in its relation to the authority and privileges and duty of this Senate, as the Senator from Kentucky presented it the other day and presents it now, it is a pretty serious one. The claim of constitutional authority on the part of one branch of this Legislature, which I discussed the other day, was made during the closing hours of the last session by the Senator from Kentucky, stated carefully, fully stated, not in his individual capacity, not in his capacity as an individual Senator, but as the conferee of this body, instructed to learn the purposes of a co-ordinate branch of the Government in regard to legislation and to report them to us; and he made as his report of the purposes of that branch of the Government, then and now controlled by a majority of his political party, a statement, in substance, that that branch proposed that there should be no appropriations for the support of the Government hereafter unless they should be permitted to dictate legislation. That was the matter—it was the closing hours and in the closing moments of the last session—which I took the first opportunity to meet and discuss fully and to any extent. I discussed it to some extent at the last session. The relation of the Senator from Ohio to it, so far as I then knew and believed, was merely that he took part in that debate, not as the author, not as the propounder, not as the interpreter of the scheme stated by the Senator from Kentucky, but simply as one very eminent Senator who took part in a debate.

When I concluded my remarks the Senator from Kentucky rose and claimed a peculiar relation to that subject on the part of the honorable Senator from Ohio, a relation to it which, in his judgment, made it improper to discuss it in his absence, a relation which in his judgment made it the duty of the Senate of the United States to adjourn and stop debate until he could come back to his seat, and what was that relation? The relation was that he was chairman of a subcommittee of a democratic party caucus, and that it was the duty of Senators and the duty of the Senate to refrain from debate and discussion and action until the views of the chairman of a subcommittee of a democratic caucus could be ascertained, and if I have understood the Senator from Kentucky rightly—and I beg him to observe whether I understood him rightly or not—he said fifteen minutes ago, if his words struck my ear correctly, that he did not know whether he, the Senator himself, had the right to express his opinion upon this subject until these measures that he spoke of had been matured by a caucus. That is a pretty interesting declaration in regard to the extent of the privileges of a United States Senator. The Senator from Delaware says that the democratic party is not governed by King Caucus, differing in that respect from any other party, but by King Constitution. Did the Senator from Delaware in his speech mean simply to commend himself to the favorable consideration of the Senate? Certainly not; he was expressing his views of the opinions of the political party to which he belongs.

Will the Senator from Delaware inform the Senate whether he agrees now with the Senator from Kentucky that a Senator has not a right to express his opinion on a pending measure until a caucus of his party has determined its policy? Will the Senator inform the Senate whether he agrees that the chairman of a subcommittee of a political caucus has any relation whatever to measures pending for legislation in this body which requires us to consult his convenience or to determine whether he is present or absent, whether he is known to the King Constitution and is one of his servants and prime ministers? If the democratic party is not governed by King Caucus but by King Constitution, I am afraid King Constitution is one of those Oriental monarchs never seen outside of his palace, and never permitted to have a voice in the government of the State, and that the prime minister, the Grand Vizier, after all is the authority which the Senator from Kentucky seems chiefly to respect.

I repeat for the information of the Senator from Delaware, that the connection of the Senator from Ohio with this subject, alleged on the other side of the Chamber as the reason for then suppressing debate was, not that he happened to make one of the speeches upon the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky adverted to in my remarks, but it was that he was chairman of a subcommittee of a democratic caucus, and it was that claim which it is endeavored on this side of the Chamber to repel. The Constitution had nothing to do with it.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I have learned long ago one rule which I rarely depart from, and that is, when I ascertain what the enemy wants me to do, to be sure not to do it; and as the republicans seem to have put up the Senator from Massachusetts to bring on a debate upon an abstract proposition for some purpose, perhaps to fortify the President by the views of one or two friends, (he is assumed to be one of the very few on that side of the Chamber who can speak in such a way as to strengthen the President up to a veto while the others are using him as the cat's paw to pull the chestnuts out of the fire,) I do not intend to aid him in doing it by any wrangle now. I can afford to wait until the measures come up, and then I assure him again that the speech he made against the positions taken by me will be answered, I think to the satisfaction of the country. But if all this effort is to make me go into a wrangle with him now and to intensify the little there is of real loyalty to the President—for I think there is very little of it and that only outside; you can count with your fingers all on that side of the House who profess to have any—to veto any measure that may be sent to him, I do not propose to do it until I see what the measures are. Gentlemen may just as well save themselves any further effort to endeavor to induce me to go into this debate. I deny what the Senator has said that I do not dare to speak my individual opinions until the caucus has declared its view.

Mr. HOAR. Pardon me. That was not the phrase I used.

Mr. BECK. I am not caring about phrases. That is what the Senator wanted the country to understand that I had said. What I said was that I desired and intended, if I could, to have a measure of legislation before the Senate before I discussed it. The measures to which this discussion applies are being carefully considered.

Mr. DAWES. In this connection will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. BECK. Very well.

Mr. DAWES. I should really like to know, for information, if the Senator can inform the Senate how long it will be before those measures of legislation will be so far matured that deliberation in the two Houses upon those measures can properly commence?

Mr. BECK. I can only answer that the committees will be furnished in good time, I have no doubt, with proper measures, and the Senator from Massachusetts can restrain himself in the mean time.

Mr. DAWES. I did not know but that the Senator from Kentucky might give us a little information so as to relieve the country from anxiety. How long before we shall have the measures alluded to?

Mr. BECK. The country is not half as anxious as the stalwart republicans are to get the two Senators from Massachusetts and other friends of the President to strengthen him up to a veto of the legislation that may come. I am not anxious, the democratic party is not anxious, on the subject. If the two Senators from Massachusetts, the peculiar friends of the gentleman at the other end of the Avenue, will wait a little while we will give them ample opportunity to discuss every proposition fully.

I desire to say this in addition which I forgot to say before: the Senator from Delaware, while he was up, alluded to the fact that he did not approve of the motion that I made the other day. I explained the circumstances under which I made it, that I made it after arrangement with the Senator from Pennsylvania that the motion to adjourn should at once be made, and we believed it ought to be carried, as it was, the object being to give the Senator from Ohio, if he desired it, an opportunity to answer the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, which was written and carefully prepared. I will not take time to read that part of it charging him as well as myself with all sorts of revolutionary schemes, (I have the RECORD before me;) I will not say that he did it in language somewhat offensive, but in such a tone that it required an answer. I was prepared to answer then, but I did not desire to do it, and do not now. The Senator from Ohio perhaps may not answer at all, but he ought to have an opportunity to do so if he desires it, and it was to give him the opportunity that I made my motion, not to cut off debate, for I never will make a motion to cut off debate in the Senate. I did not do it for any other purpose except (the RECORD shows what was said) that I expected the Senator from Ohio to be in his seat the next morning, when he would have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. HOAR. Before the Senator from Kentucky sits down I desire him to yield to me to say, so that he may not misunderstand this matter, that I did not impute to him or understand him to use the phrase that he did not dare to express his opinion. I said nothing of that kind. What I understood him to say was that he did not know that he had a right to express his opinion until these measures had been matured in caucus.

Mr. BECK. If I said that, I did not intend to say any such thing. I intended to say that I did not wish, before I knew what measures were brought before us for legislation, to anticipate them or to assume what would be the form in which they would be brought up, and that I did not care to discuss them in advance. I may have said I did not have the right as a new man in the Senate to be anticipating matters of such gravity until the measures themselves were presented.

Mr. McDONALD. I rise to make an inquiry, and that is whether any Senator desires further to discuss this resolution at this time, for if there is no desire to discuss the resolution I shall certainly renew the motion that has been suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, that the resolution for the present do lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) That motion is now pending, and this debate goes on by unanimous consent.

Mr. McDONALD. If there is any desire to discuss the matter at this time on the part of any Senator on either side——

Mr. EATON. It was with that understanding that I made the motion, and I said I would withdraw it if anybody desired to discuss it.

Mr. BLAINE. There is not much encouragement for discussion, because——

Mr. McDONALD. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana declines to yield.

Mr. McDONALD. In a few moments I will, however. A good deal has been said about attempting to cut off debate and making motions that had the effect of bringing before this body the previous question in effect. There has been a good deal of liberty of debate this morning. We have a rule that no Senator shall speak more than twice on the same subject until all other Senators who desire to speak shall have spoken. There have been many speeches made on this subject by the same Senator and a debate continuing for nearly one hour under a motion that did not admit of debate. It seems to me that complaints about attempts on the part of the majority to stifle debate and prevent discussion come with an ill grace with those facts before the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. All I intended to remark was that the gentlemen did not give us much encouragement for debate when the honorable Senator from Kentucky said his object was to lay on the table a resolution which contained a mere abstract proposition. Now if we cannot debate abstract propositions, and practical legislation is all fixed and fashioned before it gets in here, it seems to me the area of discussion is very much narrowed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think, Mr. President, a word ought to be spoken that has not yet been heard in connection with this peculiar discussion. The purpose of the Senator from Maine is very apparent to everybody. It is to make a point to the country that this side of the Chamber is proceeding in some unusual way to bring measures for legislation before it. Prudence, caution, and circumspection may be an unusual feature on the part of the majority of this Chamber in preparing measures to be submitted to it for its action. I think that quite likely in view of the character of the legislation which has emanated from this body in years gone by. I am very frank to say that the democratic party in the majority, holding itself responsible to the country for the legislation which shall be proposed and matured and perfected, is proceeding with caution, with care, and not with hot and indecent haste. We have reached a point which involves measures of the most vital importance, which involves doctrines as deep down as the foundations of the Constitution, and we have appointed committees supposed to be among our ablest and most experienced men to consider the best mode by which public justice and right can be accomplished. That duty is being performed. We have no apology to make for it at all; we have no explanation other than the fact to make for it; and I think the American people will be well pleased to know that in the change which has taken place in the majority of this body the legislation proposed is undergoing careful consideration. If the opposite side of the Chamber has not resorted to such proceedings in the past, there is one circumstance that explains the shattered and broken condition of that party here to-day on this floor.

The Senator from Maine taunts us with having appointed a committee of safety. If there had been a committee of safety to watch the fortunes of the republican party for the last fifteen years, perhaps that side would not now be stripped of its majority, and its chairs empty and the power transferred to this side. I, sir, avow the entire responsibility, so far as this side is concerned, for a procedure of prudence and care. I have only to say, in addition, that if any Senator on that side desires to speak we will sit here with the accustomed respect and courtesy that becomes this body and listen to him. We will not vacate our chairs, as I have seen done so often on that side in political debate; we will not go to our committee rooms that have for the first time been provided for us, as the Senators on that side have so often done when political discussion took place; we will stay here in our places and hear discussion. But the Senators on the opposite side will pardon me for saying that we, responsible to the country for the legislation, will bring it forward in our own way and at our own time, and not subject to the dictation or taunts of the opposition.

I thought, Mr. President, it was as well to avow our position broadly and squarly before the country, and let the Senator from Maine and the two Senators from Massachusetts take the benefit of their course on this occasion.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understand the Senator from Indiana to say that measures which should naturally be matured by the Judiciary Committee, like the electoral law, that measures that should naturally be matured by the Military Committee, like the reduction and reorganization of the Army, are now in the hands of this committee of safety, that when they have matured them and fashioned them and concluded them, they will be brought in here, and the dumb show of referring them to the committees here, which are supposed to have something like original jurisdiction, will be gone through with. I am glad the honorable Senator avows it all. All I desired to point was just the fact which he admits. All I desired the country to understand was that a new order of things had been organized here, and that the heretofore orderly methods of legislation, in pursuance of law and the Constitution of the country, are superseded by an outside, irresponsible committee, which issues and dictates its orders before the responsible representatives of the States and the people are called upon to pass upon them.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Maine has a prolific way of placing words in an opponent's mouth which he never uttered; but when the Senator from Maine says that I avow that a different state of things exists here from heretofore, and that there has been a new departure, that is true, and the country, I think, will be glad to know that it is true. There has been a new departure, and in that new departure is involved a care and circumspection, I trust, in our legislative proceedings hereafter that has never marked the party that was dominant but yesterday in this Chamber. I trust so at least. When the Senator, however, proceeds to say that an outside and irresponsible committee is shaping the duties of the Judiciary Committee and the other committees, nobody knows better than he himself how unjust such a construction is. We are considering measures to be brought before this body and before the other branch of Congress in view of an extraordinary crisis which has impelled an extra session of Congress, and I desire to say again that we will do that in our own way; and, notwithstanding the keen and earnest desire of the Senator from Maine to lead us by his advice, his irrepressible disposition to impose his views upon everybody, we stand here most politely and respectfully declining his political consultation and his political leadership.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] at the close of the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. HOAR,] the other day, expressed great anxiety lest those remarks might have the effect to stiffen up some one elsewhere, and indicated that that was the purpose of the remarks. He renewed that anxiety to-day; and upon a simple inquiry on my part, when we might be expected to be permitted to proceed to the deliberations contemplated by the Constitution in either branch, he repeated that anxiety and coupled me also in the effort at which he manifested so much alarm. I want to say to him, sir, that if he has built up any anticipations of success in these revolutionary measures in the quarter to which he alludes, I bid him to put aside that delusion as early as possible, for he may understand first as well as last that in this assault upon the purity of the ballot-box there will be no division among its defenders, in whatever position under the Constitution they have been put as its defenders.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] made his statement with great calmness and deliberation, and it seems to me the position taken by the Senator from Indiana is one of very serious importance and one in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States. The Senator declines to receive any assistance from the Senator from Maine in preparing or perfecting the legislation for this country. The Constitution designed, and its whole object was to receive, the assistance of Senators, whether in the minority or the majority, in preparing legislation for this country; and the Senator from Indiana has stated distinctly here upon the floor of the Senate that the majority, representing but one political party in this country, is preparing and perfecting legislation which shall be enacted upon the floors of both Houses of Congress and to govern this country. The declination of the majority, through the Senator from Indiana, to receive any assistance from the Senator from Maine or from other able Senators upon this side of the Chamber is a position that is in conflict with all the principles which have governed us in legislation heretofore when the party to which the Senator referred was in the majority.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, if no gentleman wishes to make remarks on the subject before us, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

SENATE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Before that is done I should like to have a resolution taken up and referred. I offered a resolution yesterday in regard to the employés of the Senate. I ask now that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered if there be no objection. The Chair hears none; the reference is made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERNAN. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty-seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and twenty-two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 27, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PRICE. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution, to which I think there will be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 5,000 copies of public act No. 90, third session, Forty-fifth Congress, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of arrears of pensions," granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to this particular resolution, but I think it had better lie over. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan demands a vote upon the pending motion, which is on a reference to the Committee on Rules of certain matters introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. I stated yesterday that I had no understanding or knowledge in relation to the other side of the House. I was not aware of any opposition to my motion, which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] seems to think I ought to have known. I would not for a moment take advantage of anything that was done yesterday. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the reconsideration, and I will withdraw the resolution. That is more magnanimity than I have had here in sixteen years. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks to have the vote reconsidered for the purpose of enabling him to withdraw the proposition which was yesterday referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I object.

The SPEAKER. The remedy can be reached by refusing to lay upon the table a motion to reconsider.

Mr. COX. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. The question then is on reconsidering the vote by which the proposition of the gentleman from New York was referred to the Committee on Rules.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair now understands that the gentleman from New York withdraws the proposition.

Mr. COX. I now withdraw the motion, but I will offer it on Monday.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce at this time a bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

Mr. GARFIELD. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, was received and read a first and second time.

Mr. SPARKS. I would say that this is substantially the bill as it passed the House of Representatives of the Forty-fifth Congress at its last session, with the clauses stricken out in relation to the reorganization of the Army. It is also substantially the bill as passed by the Senate with the insertion of the clauses repealing the two provisions of the statute relating to the use of the troops at the polls. It is really the bill which was informally agreed upon in the conference committee of the two Houses of the last Congress, excepting the portion relating to the repeal of the provisions of the statutes allowing soldiers at the polls.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the gentleman should move that the bill be printed.

Mr. SPARKS. If it be the sense of the House I would prefer that we proceed now to the consideration of the bill. As a matter of course, in the Committee of the Whole the bill will be read by paragraphs for debate and amendment.

The SPEAKER. And the bill is now subject to general debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. Are there enough printed copies of the bill for the use of the House?

Mr. SPARKS. There have been three hundred copies of the bill printed, and they ought to be upon the desks of the members, and I presume will be in a few minutes.

Mr. GARFIELD. If that is so I do not see any objection to going on with the discussion and consideration of the bill now.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House has resolved to go into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SPRINGER, will take the chair.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that all general debate upon the bill be limited to five minutes.

Mr. CONGER. That motion is too late; I object to it.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent at this time, and there is objection. The Chair would suggest that the committee can at any time rise and come into the House for the purpose of obtaining an order limiting debate.

Mr. SPARKS. I wanted to have the limit fixed now.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army. Under the rules of the House governing the transaction of business in the Committee of the Whole, the Clerk will now report the bill at length.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask consent that the first and formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. CONGER. The bill is just being laid upon the desks of members. Let it be read, and members will then have an opportunity of examining it and understanding it.

Mr. SPARKS. Very well; if there is objection to my proposition, let the bill be read.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, but before concluding,

Mr. COX said: I ask unanimous consent of the committee that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with. It is the old Army appropriation bill of the last session except the sixth section, and the bill will have to be read and considered by paragraphs hereafter. I think there will be no objection to dispensing with the further reading of the bill.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman speaks as if he were almost the only member of the House to consider this bill. Probably more than half of the members of the House never saw the old Army appropriation bill.

Mr. SPARKS. Allow me a moment. Would not members get a better insight into the bill when it is read by sections?

Mr. COX. And debated.

Mr. SPARKS. Allow me to suggest this to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER:] Would it not save time, as the bill must be read by paragraphs and be open to debate and amendment, to dispense with the formal reading of the bill?

Mr. CONGER. I have no particular desire myself to have the bill read. I supposed that members would have an opportunity, the first which they have had, to examine the bill and ascertain what it is, while it was being read without debate and amendment. So far as I am myself concerned, I do not know but what I would withdraw my objection to dispensing with the further reading of the bill. If there are others who desire to object let them do so.

Several MEMBERS. Do not withdraw the objection.

Mr. CONGER. Very well, then, I will maintain my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The first reading of the bill in Committee of the Whole cannot be dispensed with except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPARKS. And objection is made?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill, having been read at length, is now subject to general debate.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, this bill, as I stated on introducing it, is substantially the Army appropriation bill as it passed the House at the last session, except that the provisions for the reorganization of the Army are in the main stricken out.

The Senate amended the bill in relation to the subject of mileage and the pay department by the addition altogether of several hundred thousand dollars. They increased appropriations in the bill to the extent perhaps of three or four hundred thousand dollars. In the printed bill, beginning with the last line of page 3, members will find quite a long proviso which has been inserted in the printed bill by mistake; it is not a part of the bill introduced by me this morning. It was never agreed to in the conference committee; and as the House never assented to that amendment of the Senate, we have not thought proper to incorporate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report that portion of the printed bill which has been erroneously included in the print and is not a part of the bill as introduced.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That officers of the Army on the frontier, for travel, on duty, under orders, and not by railroad, may, at their option, receive mileage according to existing law and regulations, or the actual necessary expenses of such travel, according to such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That so much of the act of July 24, 1876, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877," as prohibits payment of mileage for travel over any railroad on which the troops and supplies of the United States are entitled to be transported free of charge be, and is hereby, repealed.

Mr. SPARKS. The next paragraph in regard to cost of telegrams, &c., was an amendment added to the original bill in the House, as will be remembered, on motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Butler.) The amendment adopted by the House was modified in the Senate, and we have adopted it in precisely that modified form.

There were no other material amendments, except as to amount. The Senate, as I have already stated, increased the appropriations in the bill to the extent perhaps of three or four hundred thousand dollars; but the conferees agreed that the House had appropriated enough. Hence, in respect to the amounts appropriated we have conformed to the bill as passed by the House, with one exception. On page 10 of the printed bill will be found the following provision:

For construction of a military post near the Niobrara River in Northern Nebraska or Dakota, at a point to be selected by the General of the Army, with the approval of the Secretary of War, $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

This provision was adopted by the Senate as an amendment. The Committee on Appropriations of the House would have inserted such a provision originally, had the subject been brought to their attention. But the information and estimates from the Department came too late to be considered in the House. We regarded this amendment of the Senate as proper, and have inserted the provision in this bill. Hence the aggregate amount of the appropriations contained in the bill is increased to just that extent—$50,000 for the construction of this military post on the Niobrara River in Nebraska, which we regarded as important.

There are no other differences between this bill and the bill as passed by the House, except as to the reorganization of the Army. All the provisions with reference to the reorganization of the Army have been in the main stricken out. There was, however, in the first section of the reorganization amendment, in connection with other matter, this provision:

And the examiner of State claims in the office of the Secretary of War shall have, while on such duty, the pay, emoluments, and allowances of mounted officers one grade higher than that held by him in his regiment or corps.

This provision which was left in the bill by the Senate we have inserted in this bill as section 3.

Two other clauses of the reorganization provisions we have agreed to leave in this bill. One of these constitutes section 4 of this bill, and is as follows:

SEC. 4. That when a vacancy occurs in the office of professor of the French language or in the office of professor of the Spanish language in the Military Academy, both these offices shall cease, and the remaining one of the two professors shall be professor of modern languages; and thereafter there shall be in the Military Academy one, and only one, professor of modern languages; and that section 1336 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by inserting, after the word "service" in the first line, the words "as professor."

This was agreed to by the Senate conferees, and we thought it important to retain it.

Section 5, on page 14, was also a part of the reorganization provisions adopted in the House. This section, which we retain, is as follows:

That each member of the next two graduating classes of the Military Academy, after graduation, may elect to receive the gross sum of $750 and mileage to his place of residence; and the acceptance of this gross sum shall render him ineligible to appointment in the Army until two years after his graduation; and the amount required to defray the expenditure herein provided for shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

These provisions are the only portions of the reorganization amendment which are retained.

I now come to the provisions embraced in this bill for a modification of the statute with reference to the use of troops to preserve the peace at the polls. This matter is very familiar to all the members of the Forty-fifth Congress, and I do not propose to discuss it. Upon consultation with gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber, it is thought well that we now close the general debate on all the bill except this provision, upon which general debate might proceed for such time as may be hereafter determined. I move, therefore, that the committee rise with the view of closing general debate on all other portions of the bill in one minute.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest to my friend from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] that very probably unanimous consent will be given in Committee of the Whole, without rising, to the arrangement he suggests. I think it a fair proposition, as all parties are evidently anxious to get through with the formal, ordinary details of the bill. I therefore join the gentleman in asking that general debate be now closed on the whole bill excepting the provisions with reference to the use of troops at the polls, and that we at once proceed to consider the other portions of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] asks unanimous consent that all general debate on this bill except as to section 6 be now closed, and that the Committee of the Whole proceed to consider the other portions of the bill under the five-minute rule. Is there objection? [A pause.] The Chair hears none. It is so ordered. The Clerk will now proceed to read the bill by clauses for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits from rendezvous to depot, $75,000. And no money appropriated by this act shall be paid for recruiting the Army beyond the number of twenty-five thousand enlisted men, including Indian scouts and hospital stewards; and thereafter there shall be no more than twenty-five thousand enlisted men in the Army at any one time, unless otherwise authorized by law. Nothing, however, in this act shall be construed to prevent enlistments for the Signal Service, which shall hereafter be maintained, as now organized and as provided by law, with a force of enlisted men not exceeding four hundred and fifty, after present terms of enlistment have expired.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois in charge of this bill whether the number four hundred and fifty for the Signal Service meets the requirements of that service according to the wishes of those at the head of it. I understand there was a request from the Signal Service for increase of force corresponding with the increased stations provided for at the last session in another bill.

Mr. SPARKS. I will state to the gentleman from Michigan that Mr. Hewitt, of New York, who was then chairman of the subcommittee, mainly prepared this bill, and it was my understanding that it did meet with the requirements of the Signal Service department. The design was to do so, and I understand that it did.

Mr. CONGER. The appropriation in the sundry civil bill, or perhaps in another bill, provided for an increased number of stations.

Mr. CLYMER. No increased number beyond what is provided for in this bill was asked in conference.

Mr. SPARKS. No, sir.

Mr. CONGER. As I understand it the sundry civil appropriation bill provided for an increased number of stations which would require of course an increased number of observers. Now, what I wish to know is whether the appropriation provided for in this bill meets the requirement of that increased force in the Signal Service?

Mr. SPARKS. I can only say in answer to the gentleman that this was made with the approval of the Committee on Appropriations, and my recollection is that it met with the approval of the Department fully. It was approved by the conference committee I know and I think the gentleman will find that it is all right.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman, as I do not propose to make any amendment, to consent before the bill is put upon its final passage, if it should be found necessary, to an amendment being offered to this paragraph.

Mr. WHITE. If the gentleman from Michigan will allow me, I think I can answer the inquiry he has propounded.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is out of order unless an amendment is made.

Mr. SPARKS. This is an inquiry which perhaps ought to be answered; the spirit which prompts it is a good one.

Mr. WHITE. If my friend from Michigan will allow me, having had something to do with the reorganization features of the Army bill which passed the last House, and which I should be glad to see pass at this time, but we are not talking about that just now, I wish to say in this connection that the Signal-Service provision remained intact and is provided for here as it was left by the Army appropriation bill at the close of the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress. There was some special provision made for increase at the instance and request of the head of the Signal Service, but the clause and appropriation now under consideration, as I understand it, do not in the least impair or change what was then agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I so understand it, and I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that I have no objection whatever to consent being granted to going back to this particular point if hereafter it should be found necessary to do so.

Mr. CONGER. I only ask that that may be understood.

Mr. SPARKS. There is no objection.

Mr. CONGER. That is, that before the bill passes we may go back to this paragraph, and, if it be necessary, move to amend so as to make the force sufficient to meet the requirements of the increased number of Signal-Service stations heretofore provided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to that understanding.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I move, in lines 12 and 14, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen," so as to provide that the number of enlisted men in the Army shall not be increased beyond fifteen thousand.

Mr. KEIFER. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, it changes existing law and is not in order.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 119.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move to amend by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "twenty," so as to provide that the number of enlisted men in the Army shall not be increased beyond twenty thousand enlisted men.

Mr. COX. These various motions were made on this bill at the last session. For one I always voted for them. The bill seems to be reported now as it came from the last Congress, and I do not propose by voting one way or the other to commit myself in favor of an Army of twenty-five thousand men to be used for any purpose. Without opening up any debate on the subject I will refer members to an elaborate and exhaustive discussion on the relation of the Army to free government and especially to elections in the speech of Senator Powell, of Kentucky, made during the war in 1863. It is all in that speech, and if I had the right I would like to have that speech reprinted in the RECORD for the consideration of old members as well as new ones.

I will not, however, make any opposition to the amendment proposed. I know that all these amendments have already been considered, and that it is a foregone conclusion they will be voted down.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I proposed the amendment under a misapprehension, and I will withdraw it.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following paragraph:

For cost of telegrams; and telegrams are authorized to be transmitted by railroad companies which may have telegraph lines, and which shall file their written acceptance of the restrictions and obligations imposed on telegraph companies by title 65 of the Revised Statutes, for the Government and for the general public, at rates to be fixed by the Government, according to the provisions of title 65 of the Revised Statutes; and also for compensation of citizen witnesses attending upon courts-martial, military commissions, courts of inquiry; traveling expenses of paymasters' clerks, $70,000: Provided, That the appropriations under the head of "Pay department" in this act, amounting to $12,299,800, shall be accounted for by disbursing officers under the title of "Pay, &c., of the Army, 1880;" and in case any item of the said appropriation shall prove insufficient for its purposes the excess in any other item or items thereof may, with the written consent of the Secretary of War, be applied thereto: Provided, however, That the total amount appropriated under this head shall not be exceeded.

Mr. SAMFORD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the paragraph after "1880," in line 92, namely, these words: And in case any item of the said appropriations shall prove insufficient for its purposes, the excess in any other item or items thereof may, with the written consent of the Secretary of War, be applied thereto: Provided, however, That the total amount appropriated under this head shall not be exceeded.

Mr. SAMFORD. I understand, Mr. Chairman—of course I have had no information as to the discussion which was had upon this bill in the last Congress—but I understand that these appropriation bills are made up under estimates from the heads of Departments. It is the usual course, as I am further informed, that the estimates are not made less than are necessary; and I am further informed that everything that is appropriated is always expended.

Now, sir, if, after an appropriation has been made upon a liberal estimate, for specified purposes, it shall be found an appropriation has been made for other and different objects, which will appear by the actual expenditure to be too large, it does not seem to me to be proper to allow that appropriation to be diverted into any other channel, at the discretion of officers who spend the money. The amount so required had better come up in a subsequent session under the head of deficiencies, if at all—we can then judge of their propriety—rather than be given now to the discretion of officials in expending public funds. The Department itself, as I understand, has not asked for any larger appropriation for the several items than the estimate. Therefore I move to strike out those lines.

Mr. SPARKS. The explanation of that clause is about this: covering the item from line 75 it simply makes that service, if you please, elastic. There may be some branch in which there may be some deficiency in the amount appropriated. There may be another branch—and it is all confined, mind you, to that section—there may be another branch in which there is a surplus of funds. This gives elasticity by permitting the Department to use the surplus to supply the deficiency.

Some insist that this is an increase of power given to the Executive Departments that is objectionable. I am not sure myself but it is objectionable. I am, however, convinced that the service would be promoted, if wisely managed, by giving this authority. The question is whether or not we can trust the executive officers of the Government. This gives them some power to use a surplus to supply a deficiency and will prevent deficiencies. We are annoyed a good deal by deficiencies, I will state to the gentleman. Hence the last House, taking that view of it, adopted this section as it is; the Senate adopted it as it is; it is the bill, therefore, of both the House and the Senate, already adopted in that particular.

I do not want to make a special argument in favor of any increase of power on the part of the executive officers. In my judgment there are cases where that increase of power may not be wisely extended. If it be not so in this case, it is for the committee to determine.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this provision, in my judgment, is subject to the point of order that it changes existing law and does not reduce expenditures. I did not see fit to make the objection for reasons which I will state. This clause was originally reported by the Committee on Appropriations. I dissented from it at the time; and for the reason given by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] in part.

In the early history of this kind of legislation there was a disposition, to use the expression of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] to trust the Departments. With further experience there was a distrust begotten, and a disposition to separate the details and provide what might be expended in every particular service with great speciality, taking away discretion. That is wise legislation and we have been advancing in that direction all the while.

The distinguished gentleman who had charge of this bill in the last Congress, anxious to keep the nominal amount down, inserted this provision. At that time there was a general disposition on both sides of the House to allow it to remain, upon a statement of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Foster, that with this provision the amount would be retained as it is, and with that view it was accepted. Unless that provision shall remain there it is manifest there will be a deficiency. And while I agree with my friend from Alabama I hope, under the circumstances under which we have met here, he will withdraw the amendment. I will take pleasure in going with him hereafter the very furthest extent in the line he has indicated.

Mr. ATKINS. I agree with my friend from Georgia entirely in the view he has taken of this subject. I think as a general thing this is not proper legislation. I think that each branch of the service should be confined to the appropriations made specifically for that branch. But, as the gentleman from Georgia has remarked, the reason why this was done was because it was asserted, and because, indeed, it is true, that a less appropriation would be required with this clause inserted in the bill than otherwise. Hence it was inserted; and that is the only apology the Committee on Appropriations had for departing from what I consider the very good rule which has just been explained. It was simply because we desired to cut down the appropriations and make a less sum do. I think in the peculiar circumstances under which we are considering this bill we had better let this clause remain as it is.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] might have stated also that a similar provision was inserted in the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope my friend from Alabama will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not satisfied that a necessity has been shown for departing in this instance from the ordinary rule. I hope, therefore, the gentleman will not withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. If it is intended to insist on this amendment, then the estimate ought to be revised and the amount increased. Is the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] prepared to say what the amount should be?

Mr. REAGAN. It is always easy to find pretexts for taking away responsibility from officers.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman will excuse me.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman had better excuse himself for taking me off the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Texas had resigned the floor.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish also to state that the point of order was made upon this clause, and it was ruled in order and was discussed in the House and passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] is recognized as having the floor.

Mr. ATKINS. I had to sit down, and I will be obliged by the Chair reminding me what I was then talking about. [Laughter.]

I rose to suggest that we would have to increase this sum if the latter part of the clause is stricken out. It was put in for the purpose of diminishing expenditures. In putting in this provision the amount was cut down. If it is stricken out the amount will have to be increased. And I was asking the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] if he was prepared to state what amount would be necessary to increase the appropriation in case this provision should be stricken out.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I only asked the gentleman the question by way of argument. I know he cannot answer it, as a matter of course, unless he goes over the estimates and makes the calculation. Perhaps the gentleman has a process of arithmetic of his own.

Mr. REAGAN. I have a process of arithmetic of my own.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish the gentleman would produce it for the information of the House. I trust that the clause will be allowed to remain as it now stands. I care nothing about it personally, but I am perfectly satisfied that under the Secretary of War whom we now have, and the officers under him who are to administer this fund, it will not be abused, and I think that the clause ought to remain in the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I move pro forma to strike out the last word of the clause. I have a substantial objection to this provision. It is admitted by all gentlemen who have spoken that this is an innovation in our system of legislation. That is certainly true. It allows a public officer to loosely transfer the appropriation of public money from one subject to another. It takes away the individual responsibility of the officer. It is calculated to confuse his accounts. It is wrong in principle and an innovation upon our rule of legislation, and if we incorporate it into a law we shall have the same plausible pretext for taking away responsibility for the proper disbursement of the money and applying it with reference to the items for which it is intended at the next session.

It will afford a plausible pretext for disregarding the rule we have heretofore acted upon. It is only because I would insist upon accountability and responsibility and to prevent the confusion of accounts and teach public officers that they must stand by the appropriations based on their estimates and given by Congress that I insist it shall be done.

I will say in relation to what the gentleman from Tennessee has said, that this legislation has been before Congress and has been acted on by the House and Senate and reported on by a conference committee favorably, and I see no reason for violating it. It is a wholesome usage, which has been adopted heretofore, and I trust the amendment of my friend from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] will be adopted.

Mr. CLYMER. As a general proposition I agree with what has been said by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] The necessity for this clause in the bill at this time arises from the loose, inaccurate, and incomplete method of making the estimates. The estimates should be particular and specific.

The Appropriations Committee of the last Congress had not such a basis upon which to legislate and upon which to appropriate money. The same difficulty has arisen in other Departments of the Government, in the Navy Department for instance. But by the action of the Committee on Appropriations, approved of by the House, such accurate estimates were made by the Secretary of the Navy as rendered such a clause as this unnecessary on the Navy bill, and I therefore hope and trust that in the long session of this Congress we shall demand that the estimates shall be given so that there may be no necessity for such equalization clauses as this.

But, sir, at this time I do not feel that there is any necessity for a change. I believe that under the present administration of the War Department, and under the different heads of bureaus of that Department, we may trust them to do what is just and right. By this the gross sum stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] who was formerly chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is not increased. We had better let the matter stand as it is, hoping that at another session of Congress such specific estimates will be made as will make such legislation as this unnecessary. For the present I think it is better to adhere to the provision as it stands in the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. There seems to be an impression that under this head the items were not submitted in detail in the Book of Estimates which I hold in my hand. In the Book of Estimates in which the items appear the whole amount appropriated for in the bill was $12,299,800, whereas $12,500,000 was asked for in the estimates. The bill saves upon the estimates over $200,000. The Paymaster General thought that the service could be carried out by giving it the elasticity of which the gentleman who has charge of the bill speaks.

Mr. CLYMER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLYMER. The question is this: is there any particular estimate as to the exact pay required? There is a gross estimate for the pay.

Mr. SPARKS. It is so in all cases.

Mr. ATKINS. Yes; here are all the different items set forth.

Mr. CLYMER. How many officers are to be paid?

Mr. ATKINS. I cannot tell that. There is so much estimated for sergeant-majors, so much for quartermaster-sergeants, so much for chief musician, so much for one hundred and fourteen ordnance-sergeants, so much for one hundred and forty-seven commissary-sergeants, and so on to the end of the chapter. The whole amount of the estimate is $12,500,000; over $200,000 more than the amount here proposed to be appropriated.

Mr. BLOUNT. Are not all the items just as detailed as they have been in preceding years?

Mr. ATKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. And this provision of the bill has not been placed here by reason of any lack of details in the estimates?

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly not; the gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. CLYMER. A further question. Might there not be such specific and detailed estimates as would enable us with almost exactitude to ascertain what the Department requires?

Mr. ATKINS. I will answer the gentleman by saying, as I have before intimated two or three times, that in my judgment if this provision is stricken from the bill it will be necessary to insert an amount equal to the estimates, or thereabouts; more than $200,000 over the amount here named.

Mr. REAGAN. The decrease here is not the average of the decrease in other items of the bill, and no such principle is applied to the other bureaus of the Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I renew it. If I rightly apprehend the object of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] in his amendment, it is to prevent this compounding of the business of the Department, this mixing of appropriations, after one appropriation has been exhausted.

Now, in order that the subject may be fully understood by other gentlemen as I apprehend I understand it, and as the gentleman from Alabama presents it, I will take this item of the bill for the Pay department. I find the first object or purpose for which appropriation is made is for pay of commissioned and non-commissioned officers, privates, &c., $9,880,000; that is for the pay of the officers and men. Under the head of Pay department I find another item, "for travel-pay and commutation of subsistence to discharged soldiers, $370,000."

Now, in the event that it takes only $50,000 to pay the travel pay and commutation of subsistence to these discharged men, then, under the direction of the Secretary of War, $300,000 of this item of appropriation might be used for some other object and purpose. In that way the Secretary of this Department might conceal from the Representatives of the people in what mode and manner he had used this fund.

Coming back now for a moment to the statement made by my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] I have alluded to these two items to show that I was correct when I said to my friend that this was a proposition to violate existing law. Section 3678 of the Revised Statutes says:

> All sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others.

Now, this general provision of the bill, at which my friend from Alabama [Mr. SAMFORD] strikes, violates in express terms that section of the Revised Statutes. It allows the Secretary of War to take the amount appropriated for travel pay and commutation of subsistence of discharged soldiers and apply it to the pay of officers of the Army. He is allowed to take the appropriation made for one purpose and apply it to another.

The experience of this country in all of its departments shows the wisdom, the supreme wisdom, of the existing law. It has been because the officers of your Government have violated your law that fraud and corruption have become manifest in not only one but various departments of the Government. It behooves us, the Representatives of the people, now at the threshold to put our foot upon any departure from the wisdom of those who have in their experience made this wholesome and salutary provision of the existing statutes.

Mr. SPARKS. I am somewhat surprised at the wide range which this discussion has taken. Remember that this identical provision passed the House of Representatives of the Forty-fifth Congress, passed the Senate, and passed a tolerably fighting conference committee. It has all that indorsement.

Mr. McCOOK. And passed the caucus, too? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS. I did not know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] knew all the secrets of the democratic caucus. How do you know it passed the caucus?

Mr. McCOOK. I ask you the question. I have read it in the papers.

Mr. SPARKS. You ask me the question. I beg to say that I am not permitted to give the gentleman from New York any democratic secrets.

Mr. McCOOK. I am very glad of it; I would not like to be the recipient of them. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS. Then the gentleman should not ask for them. [Laughter.] I have made the statement as to the indorsement which this provision has received. Now, with all this examination by members of the last Congress, it was not discovered that there was any law specifically prohibiting such a provision as this. What is that law?

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to ask my friend whether the point of order was not made by myself that this very provision was contrary to existing law, a point of order which was overruled by the Chair?

Mr. SPARKS. I do not remember.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, the record will show it.

Mr. SPARKS. The law on this subject means, if it means anything, that you shall not take an appropriation, for instance, for transportation, and use that fund for the Pay department; but it does not prohibit, in express terms at least, the use of the pay appropriation for any branch of the Pay department. This appropriation is all pay. The first item is for pay of officers, amounting to something over $9,000,000. Then there are miscellaneous matters of pay running up to $12,000,000. This provision is simply that where the appropriation for one class of pay (it is all confined to pay) is deficient, the appropriation for another item in which there is a surplus may be used to meet that deficiency. Now let me ask gentlemen where harm can come from such a provision?

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend says this is "all pay." Now I would like to ask him whether under the existing law it has not been the construction and practice of the Departments that one branch of the appropriations for pay could not be used for another class of pay, notwithstanding the gentleman says that these items are "all pay."

Mr. SPARKS. Precisely; and the object of this provision is to allow that to be done.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know it is.

Mr. SPARKS. But I say that the law referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE,] and upon which he lays so much stress, prohibits an appropriation for transportation, for instance, from being used for the pay of the Army. But these appropriations are all confined to one subject—pay; and the question is simply whether when there is a surplus in one branch of the appropriations for pay, the officers having charge of this matter may be allowed to use that surplus to meet a deficiency in another branch of the pay appropriations—not to meet a deficiency, for instance, in the appropriations for transportation. I think we ought to allow this latitude. Even if the existing law prohibits such a thing, this bill proposes to that extent to repeal the law.

I wish to state that in the last Congress we adopted a precisely similar provision in the Indian appropriation bill; hence if my friend from Tennessee is so punctilious about precedents the precedent was then established. I think that this authority might be granted to the executive officers of the Government and the interests of the service still be protected.

In reply to the objection that this amounts to an increase of the appropriations in particular cases, I will say that while I would not under any circumstances increase the aggregate of these appropriations, yet in maturing this bill it was understood that by allowing this elasticity in the use of appropriations the Department could get along with somewhat less money than if we did not allow it. Can we not then afford to permit a discretion of this kind?

Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. BLOUNT rose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, no; I will take the floor afterward.

Mr. BLOUNT. I simply want to say, and I have no doubt the gentleman from Ohio will concur with me——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pro forma amendment is exhausted; but if there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as withdrawn by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] and renewed by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I dislike to take up time in discussing a question of this sort; but I regard it as a matter of importance. On this side of the House there seems to be some difference of opinion as to the propriety of this class of legislation. I propose to sustain this bill as it stands simply because we have met here under peculiar circumstances. We have no committee to consider these estimates; and this bill has come in by unanimous consent. As this matter has little relation to the question that is now interesting us all, I propose to waive all questions of this sort. I rise simply because some gentlemen on this side of the House are defending a rule in legislation which has been long ago abandoned by gentlemen on the other side, and by men of all parties, as to allowing this large discretion to officers of the Departments.

My friend from Illinois refers to the fact that a provision of this kind was inserted in the Indian appropriation bill at the last session. I admit that this provision was inserted in two general appropriation bills; but still it is a departure from wise precedent, and I know of no other instance in several years where such a thing has been done. For myself I am utterly opposed to legislation of this kind. It is now generally regarded as unwise and improper, and I for one do not undertake to defend it or to defend the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress, of which I had the honor to be a member, for sanctioning legislation of this kind. I thought it unwise at that time; I think so now. I then raised the same objection which is now raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.] I consider that in its practical effect this legislation will result in no economy of expenditures. I think the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who is quite familiar with legislation in reference to appropriations, will bear me out in the statement that any provision of this sort must be unwise in its tendency.

Mr. McLANE. If this provision related to all the appropriations for the Army, the objection stated by honorable gentlemen on this floor might be pertinent; but it applies simply to the appropriations for pay. The argument which has been addressed to the Committee of the Whole is an argument against enlarging the power of the Secretary of War in reference to the transfer of appropriations from one object to another. I do not believe there is any difference of opinion in the House as to that question. Such transfers are not only against the law, but against all sound policy. The provision in this bill, as I understand, does not authorize anything of that kind. I rose not for the purpose of making any extended remarks on this point, but to put an inquiry to the honorable gentleman who introduced this bill, [Mr. SPARKS,] or to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] lately the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I wish to know whether this provision is not confined strictly to the item of pay?

Mr. SPARKS. It so states in the bill.

Mr. McLANE. I so understand it; and if this power of transfer conferred upon the Secretary of War is confined to the "pay" item, I, for one, have no objection to it, because it is not a supposable case that the Secretary of War will transfer the pay from the officer to the soldier or from the soldier to the officer. All he does is, where the particular sum appropriated for the officer is in excess of the amount necessary to pay the officer, then he takes that excess and pays it to the private soldier where the appropriation for the private soldier happens to be deficient.

Mr. REAGAN. This pay includes pay for telegrams as well as pay for officers and soldiers, and a great many other items in the pay account.

Mr. CLYMER. It includes as well pay for clothing, and all sorts of pay.

Mr. SPARKS. If the gentleman from Maryland will look on page 5 he will find it is there provided "that the appropriations under the head of 'Pay department' in this act, amounting to $12,299,800, shall be accounted for by disbursing officers under the title of 'Pay, &c., of the Army, 1880;' and in case any item of the said appropriations shall prove insufficient for its purposes, the excess in any other item or items thereof may, with the written consent of the Secretary of War, be applied thereto; provided, however, that the total amount appropriated under this head shall not be exceeded."

Mr. McLANE. Yes, sir; that is the way I understand it. My inquiry to the Committee on Appropriations was to that point. This power is certainly a power the Secretary would not have without this provision of law, for it is in direct conflict with the standing statute of the country. But it is quite competent in appropriating $12,000,000 to relieve the Secretary from the restraint imposed by that law; and so long as it is confined to the simple appropriation for pay, authorizing the excess provided for one part of the Pay department shall be transferred to another, I do not think we should embarrass our Committee on Appropriations or the Department itself by any objection to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to delay the Committee of the Whole on any matter of detail in this bill, but there can be no better time than now when we are quietly beginning to make our record in this House in regard to appropriations to act carefully on this class of legislation. The gentleman who has just taken his seat says very properly the general law there is right and he approves it, but he does not think this does interfere with its spirit because "pay" is a single thing. If gentlemen will open the bill which lies before us, commencing in line 33 and running down to line 85, they will see sixteen special objects to which "pay" is appropriated. The word "pay" of the Army means sixteen different objects. For example, first, to pay contract surgeons; second, paymasters' clerks; third, hospital stewards; fourth, hospital matrons; fifth, commissary-sergeants; sixth, messengers to paymasters; seventh, extra-duty pay to enlisted men; eighth, travel pay and commutation of subsistence to discharged soldiers; ninth, retained pay to discharged men; tenth, commutation of officers' quarters; eleventh, pay to soldiers for clothing not drawn; twelfth, additional pay to enlisted men; thirteenth, mileage of officers of the Army when traveling under orders; fourteenth, cost of telegrams; fifteenth, compensation of citizen witnesses attending upon courts-martial, &c., and, sixteenth, traveling expenses of paymasters' clerks. There are sixteen separate objects to which "pay of the Army" is devoted, and Congress has undertaken to divide and separate those objects and to appropriate a specific sum to each. Some of those items are $100,000 and some are $40,000, the whole aggregating a large number of millions. The theory of the law is we bind the Secretary of War and all the accounting officers of the Government to keep all those appropriations separate and apart to the special object for which they are designed in the law. Now, if you say the Secretary of War shall transfer from any one of those which happens to be in excess to any other, see what will happen. As to the number of citizen clerks he may have, or paymasters' clerks, as to the amount of traveling that may be done, as to the cost of telegraphing which is not fixed by law, and only by appropriation, and a large number of these items are limited only by the appropriation bill and not by fixed statutes, then if you say the Secretary of War shall transfer from any one of these sixteen items to any other, you will take off the restriction of limitation by law in the direction of economy, and I think that is unwise. I have no more interest in this, because the clause of the law was put there when I was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as a mode of protecting us from lawless and irregular charges which we could not in any other way correct.

There were unexpended balances at one time since I have been in Congress that have been accumulating from year to year in one of the bureaus of one of the Departments of this Government amounting to some $25,000,000; and the power of transfer that was allowed under the loose forms of the law permitted the heads of Departments to do almost anything they pleased with the money of the Government. The appropriation having been once made it lay in their hands, and the power of transfer gave them full power over it.

Now, I believe this clause of the proviso attached to this paragraph is in the wrong direction. Let us appropriate as much money as we think is necessary, and if a deficiency appropriation turns out to be necessary let us make it in another session. But I hope the gentleman in charge of this bill will let the whole proviso go out from line 86 to line 98.

Mr. SPARKS. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to favor the amendment?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do.

Mr. SPARKS. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to accept the amendment; but I wish to state that this provision was put into the bill at the suggestion of the executive officers of the War Department, and that it was inserted by the committee with the understanding that money could be saved thereby. I am willing, however, to accept the amendment, if I am authorized to do so, as it seems that the special friends of the executive department of the Government are in favor of it, the provision having been put in at the request of a branch of said department.

Mr. WHITE and Mr. COX rose.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the amendment will not be accepted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is recognized.

Mr. COX. I understand the relation of this business is this: the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] makes a motion——

Mr. GARFIELD. I was mistaken in saying that in striking out we should go clear back to line 86. The words to be stricken out are those after "1880" in the ninety-second line.

Mr. SPARKS. I have stated I will accept the amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I object to the amendment being accepted.

Mr. COX. There seems to be an agreement between both sides of the House to pass this amendment; but I think it will be an embarrassment to the gentlemen connected with the Administration to pass it.

A MEMBER. They want it.

Mr. COX. If they want it let them have it. It is a bad practice to transfer these items from one branch to another, and if the Administration want to pursue a good practice we will always be ready to meet them.

But I rose for the purpose of saying to both sides of the House that these matters in this bill are somewhat irrelevant to the issue which brings us here for an extra session. Let us come to the point by reaching the sixth section in regard to the use of troops at elections. This bill was substantially passed at the last session. It is a foregone conclusion. It was well considered and well discussed. Let us hurry on with the bill and come to the point of difference.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; let us have a vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] to assent to this going out of the bill?

Mr. SPARKS. I do.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know that distinctly, because I desire to be governed in my action in this matter by what the gentleman proposes to do.

Mr. WHITE. I will not detain the committee by entering upon the discussion of this question. I understood the sentiment of this House was to take this portion of the bill as it comes from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS.] I have the greatest respect for the judgment of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] on this side of the House on this and other questions. But I submit that as a practical question this should remain as it was originally in the bill. I submit if you strike it out for the reasons indicated in the debate thus far it may prove embarrassing to this Department of the Government. There is no gentleman here who has greater confidence than I have in the present Secretary of War, and the effect of this provision may be to relieve us of the necessity hereafter of providing for a deficiency in the War Department of the Government. Having confidence, as I believe this House has, in the Secretary of War, and having confidence in the business character of the provision itself, I must vote against the amendment.

Mr. SAMFORD. I desire to say but one word in reply to what has been said in various parts of the Hall. When I first read these lines a short time ago they struck me as being inappropriate in this place. I therefore offered an amendment to strike them out. I had never seen the bill until the opening of the session this morning, and never heard of this provision until within this hour. As soon as I had offered the amendment various gentlemen in whose judgment I had great confidence asked me to withdraw it. Other gentlemen in whose judgment I have equal confidence asked me not to withdraw it. In view of such contrariety of opinion I have waited patiently for those who desire me to withdraw the amendment to give me some reason why I should do so; but I have not been able as yet to see the force of objection made or any one good reason why the amendment should not be insisted upon. On the contrary I am strengthened in my first impression.

The main reason assigned seems to be that this provision, in the Forty-fifth Congress, passed the appropriation committees, the conference committees, and both Houses of Congress. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is no reason to my mind. I did not have the good fortune to belong to that Congress, and consequently did not hear the discussions at that time, and while the fact that the last Congress approved this legislation has some force it is not sufficient to decide me in the absence of good reason. Therefore all I have to do is to ask myself the question whether this is a proper species of legislation upon this bill or I may add on any other bill.

My mind does not sanction it for various reasons. One is that it violates existing law, as argued by the gentlemen from Tennessee and Georgia and as I read that law. Another is the reason I gave at the opening of this discussion, and which I do not intend to elaborate at this time—that these estimates which are asked for, it is generally understood, are always sufficiently large and there is no reason why you should give to the heads of these Departments any more latitude. The only argument which I understand to be offered against the proposition that this violates existing law is that all these appropriations come in under the head of "pay." Now I ask the honorable gentleman who presents this bill whether this clause commencing on line 75, for the cost of telegrams and authorizing telegrams to be transmitted by railroad companies which may have telegraph lines, and various other items in the same connection—whether all these provisions make one single item altogether with all the appropriations for the various payments and satisfy the law which requires appropriations to be specific?

Therefore I say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not think the reason is good, and, if we have to make a precedent on the subject, it seems to me that the precedent should be against such legislation as this, rather than in its favor. There is no circumscribing expenditures, if we are to put the power to expend in the discretion of heads of Departments. If it is believed that it is proper legislation, and this House should so decide, I am perfectly content to submit, but when the amendment is once offered and no good reason is given why we should recede from that proposition, for one I am not willing to withdraw it, however regardful I am of the superior abilities of those who think it unwise and impolitic to strike it out.

Mr. SPARKS. As I have already stated, the reason why this provision was originally incorporated as a part of the bill was that the Secretary of War, or the officials of the War Department acting under him, requested it. We also thought that by granting this concession to the War Office we should economize in the service; therefore, prompted by that idea, we have adopted a provision which many of us, as an abstract proposition, would have rejected. Now, if the political friends of the Secretary of War desire that this provision shall go out of the bill, as it seems many of them do, I am willing to vote in that direction; and now call for a vote on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 102, noes 87.

Mr. WHITE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITE and Mr. SAMFORD were appointed.

The question was upon striking out the following words:

And in case any item of the said appropriations shall prove insufficient for its purposes, the excess in any other item or items thereof may, with the written consent of the Secretary of War, be applied thereto: Provided, however, That the total amount appropriated under this head shall not be exceeded.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 104, noes 95.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. I give notice that I shall call for a vote by yeas and nays upon this question in the House.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

For transportation of the Army, including baggage of the troops, when moving either by land or water; of clothing and camp and garrison equipage from the depots of Philadelphia and Jeffersonville to the several posts and Army depots, and from those depots to the troops in the field; of horse equipments and of subsistence stores from the places of purchase and from the places of delivery, under contract, to such places as the circumstances of the service may require them to be sent; of ordnance, ordnance stores, and small-arms from the founderies and armories to the arsenals, fortifications, frontier posts, and Army depots; freights, wharfage, tolls, and ferriages; the purchase and hire of horses, mules, oxen, and harness, and the purchase and repair of wagons, carts, and drays, and of ships and other sea-going vessels and boats required for the transportation of supplies, and for garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several posts; hire of teamsters; transportation of funds for the Pay and other disbursing departments; the expenses of sailing public transports on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific; for procuring water at such posts as, from their situation, require it to be brought from a distance; and for clearing roads and for removing obstructions from roads, harbors, and rivers, to the extent which may be required for the actual operations of the troops in the field, $4,200,000.

For hire of quarters for troops, of storehouses for the safe-keeping of military stores, of offices, and of grounds for camp and summer cantonments, and for temporary frontier stations; for the construction of temporary huts and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts, $880,000. And in case any item of the said appropriations for "regular supplies," "incidental expenses," "barracks and quarters," and "Army transportation" shall prove insufficient for its purpose, the excess in any other of these items may, with the written consent of the Secretary of War, be applied thereto: Provided, however, That the total amount appropriated under these heads shall not be exceeded.

Mr. REAGAN. In order to conform to the previous action of the committee, I move now to strike out all after the word "dollars" in line 203, page 9, down to and including the word "exceeded" in line 210, as follows:

And in case any item of the said appropriations for "regular supplies," "incidental expenses," "barracks and quarters," and "Army transportation" shall prove insufficient for its purpose, the excess in any other of these items may, with the written consent of the Secretary of War, be applied thereto: Provided, however, That the total amount appropriated under these heads shall not be exceeded.

Mr. WHITE. I have no desire to reopen the discussion upon this question. This is the same amendment that was offered in the ninety-seventh line, striking out a provision which authorizes the transfer or use of funds which have been found more than necessary for one Department to another where the appropriation is insufficient. It merely recognizes the discretion of the Secretary of War. Now, that question was discussed a few moments ago, and since then I have been informed by a gentleman who has investigated the matter that this provision is deemed necessary.

The Committee on Appropriations in revising the estimates of the Secretary of War cut down his estimates for every item. If I am wrong in this I pause for correction.

For the purpose of meeting contingencies that might possibly arise from mistakes made, and to avoid the necessity for deficiency bills, I offer this provision allowing this discretionary power. It passed the last House, and had the approval of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate and of the committee of conference. I am therefore opposed to the amendment, and hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. REAGAN. This is exactly the same question upon which we have already passed, and I therefore decline to discuss it.

Mr. McCOOK. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas one question. In case of riot breaking out in a State, and a call being made upon the President by a democratic governor, of course the President must have means to transport the troops; and in the event of an occurrence of that kind I would like to know by what means the Secretary of War is to pay for the transportation of troops unless this appropriation is made?

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman is right in his proposition there will be no appropriation for that purpose, for this bill authorizes the transfer of an appropriation for one purpose to another item of expenditure; it does not go so far as to allow the Secretary of War to apply any portion of an appropriation to another item not appropriated for in the bill, objection to that being heretofore made. I have no apprehension that the present Secretary of War is doing so, but if the disbursing officers of the Government should see proper they might deplete one item of appropriation by taking the appropriation from that item and applying it to another, and in that way they would be exercising legislative rather than executive powers.

Mr. WHITE. The money can only be used for the case specified, and for nothing else.

Mr. BLOUNT. There is nothing in the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] that the Committee on Appropriations have cut down the estimates of the Department. Why, sir, those estimates are always cut down on all the bills. That was done by the Forty-second and by the Forty-third Congresses.

Mr. WHITE. I was not complaining; I was simply stating the fact.

Mr. BLOUNT. And I have simply made the statement in order to show that there is no reason for the conclusion to which the gentleman arrives.

Mr. GARFIELD. The only possible objection made to the proposed change is this: if this bill does not make enough appropriation to meet the wants of the Army, then there must be a deficiency; that is all. The only practical question for us to consider is this: shall we require the Committee on Appropriations and the House of Representatives and Congress to make its appropriations in open daylight, so that every one can see and understand them? and then, if a deficiency is a disgrace, let every one who helps to make it bear his share, if it is necessary to provide for a deficiency.

What I think is the just thing to do is to make appropriations enough to support the Government fully and fairly. If in any case those appropriations turn out to be not enough, then at the next session make a deficiency appropriation to cover the amount. The means resorted to here in this bill is simply one of the ways of evading the responsibility of appropriating for a deficiency. It is not the fair, open, and public way in which I think the appropriations of the Government should be made. If this bill has not enough appropriations, then we should put a sufficient amount in the bill.

Mr. ATKINS. One word. This is precisely a similar case to the other. As has been said by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] and I have myself admitted it, this is not the proper mode of legislation and is contrary to the usual practice adopted by the Committee on Appropriations for the last four years.

Yet in order to save hundreds of thousands of dollars we agreed to put this provision into this bill. The Secretary of War, the Paymaster-General, and the Quartermaster-General all made the request, stating that where there were deficits in some items and a surplus in others that surplus might be taken and applied to other items under the same general head. It was to give to the service such elasticity as that, that these provisions were placed in this bill.

I myself grant that it is not the proper mode of legislation, and I regret to be forced to any such measure as this. But the Secretary of War, Quartermaster-General, and the Paymaster-General all urged that this thing might be done, and provisions were inserted in this bill allowing such transfers to be made on the written consent of the Secretary of War.

The Committee of the Whole have taken action on this subject, and the distinguished gentleman from Ohio on the other side [Mr. GARFIELD] seems to think that this provision ought to be stricken out. I am for sticking to the most rigid rule in regard to this matter, and so far as I am concerned this provision may go out of the bill.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment has been exhausted. If the gentleman desires to speak, he can move to strike out the last word.

Mr. PRICE. Very well, I will move to strike out the last word, although I do not believe in that sort of amendment, and this is about the only time I have ever made it.

My principles compel me to vote in a certain direction upon this amendment, and I desire to state in a very few words what will govern my action in this matter. I find here a bill appropriating for special purposes a certain amount of money, and then the aggregate is stated as another certain amount. Now, the common-sense view of the matter is this: if without specifying these particular amounts we had given us an aggregate for all these various items, then there would be no occasion to offer this amendment. But it is proposed to appropriate certain amounts for these several items.

I will refer to a few of them: "Expenses of the interment of officers killed in action, or who died when on duty in the field." Can any gentleman on this floor or off of it tell me or tell the country how many officers are going to die? If he cannot tell that, then he cannot tell how much money will be required to bury them, and he cannot approximate the amount.

Another item is for telegraphing. Now, can any gentleman on this floor or off of it tell me how much telegraphing will be necessary during the coming year? And if he cannot answer that question categorically, then he cannot tell how much will be required for that purpose; it may be more or it may be less.

In addition to that, here is a certain amount for spies and guides to the Army. There may be more or there may be less expense necessary for those two items. No man can tell how much and no man can tell how little will be required. If you leave the matter to the discretion of the Secretary of War, so that if there are more spies and guides required and a less number of officers die and are buried, he can transfer the surplus from one account to the other, and that would be the proper way. That is the common-sense view of it, and is, I believe, the view upon which this bill has been framed.

Mr. BLOUNT. For the last six years appropriations have been made in this way, and I would ask the gentleman if the Government has been embarrassed at all?

Mr. PRICE. I am stating a plain proposition. I will say to the gentleman that any difficulty which has arisen heretofore has been met by a deficiency bill. I do not object to deficiency bills when they are legitimate. But I undertake to say that no man by reading this bill can tell now what these different items of expenses will be. For instance, here is an item for the delivery of deserters. Who can tell how many men will desert, or how much it will cost to deliver them? No man can tell. It is the common-sense view to take of this matter that if there is a surplus in one of these items it may be applied to another where there may be a deficiency.

I know it has been claimed that this is an innovation on the existing law. But it is admitted by the gentleman who was lately chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ATKINS] that this provision will effect a saving of money, that the estimates have been cut down in every instance, and the matter has been adjusted in this way for the purpose of economizing expenditures. Hence, I cannot see any other common-sense view to take of the question than to leave the provision as it is, and allow a surplus in one case to be applied to meet the deficiency in another, for the simple reason that we cannot ascertain to-day exactly what these expenditures for particular purposes are to be.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPARKS. This provision is identical with the one which has already been under discussion. The Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress felt that the better rule was that money should be expended by the Executive Departments according to the particular items appropriated for. The correctness of that proposition as a general rule was recognized by all the members of the committee. In reference to the Army branch of the service—in fact, as to all the branches of the public service—the committee generally found the estimates to be largely in excess of what was really required; and in this branch, as well as all others, we curtailed those estimates—on consultation, of course, with the executive officers. We brought them down to what we felt would be sufficient for the service, and in doing so we acted upon all the information we could obtain on the subject. And although, as the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. ATKINS] has stated, we felt that as a general rule it was improper to allow this "sliding scale" in the expenditures, yet the Department had estimated for more money than we were willing to grant. I am free to say, however, that in my judgment we had given an abundance. But the Department said, "If you will authorize this 'sliding scale' the money you believe sufficient and propose to appropriate will be satisfactory to us." The gentleman from New York, [Mr. Hewitt,] the chairman of the subcommittee having this bill in charge in the last Congress, and myself disagreed sometimes as to the amounts to be appropriated for many of these items. I certainly thought an abundance of money was appropriated for this service without any conditions, and think so now; but we both consented to the "sliding scale"—or the "elasticity clause," if you please to call it so—as did the general committee, upon the ground that the officers of the Department told us that with such a provision inserted in the bill they could make the amount appropriated serve every purpose. We met that wish of theirs!

I do not think the provision very material; I believe it may be struck out and there will be plenty of money to carry on and make an efficient service. So far as I am concerned, therefore, I am willing to strike it out and end it.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, it was agreed to, there being—ayes 102, noes 85.

The Clerk read as follows:

For conversion of smooth-bore guns, $50,000.

Mr. McCOOK. I move to amend this clause so as to read:

For conversion of smooth-bore and fabrication of heavy rifle-guns, $100,000.

In the last Congress I offered an amendment of similar character but of larger amount, proposing an expenditure of $250,000 for this purpose. On a division that amendment was defeated by but one vote; and Mr. Hewitt, of New York, who had the Army bill in charge at that time, said to me subsequently that if I had made the amount but $100,000 he would have assented to it. Hence, assuming that Mr. Hewitt understood the questions connected with this bill perhaps as well as any gentleman now in this House, I offer this amendment with the hope that it will go through. We have now about one thousand or fifteen hundred ten-inch smooth-bore Rodman guns, which are practically valueless for purposes of defense, but which can be converted, at an expense of about $2,000 or $2,500 to each gun, into effective eight-inch rifle-guns, which, as I understand from the Ordnance Office, will be for all practical purposes (saying nothing about the advantages of a breech-loader over a muzzle-loading gun) effective guns against an ordinary armored vessel.

Any gentleman who takes any interest whatever in the fortifications of the Eastern States has only to look at the armament of the forts of New York Harbor to satisfy himself that, excluding the torpedo system of defense, the armament of the forts in that harbor is absolutely worthless against modern armored vessels.

I do not wish to discuss this matter. I will simply suggest to my friends on the other side that by no possibility can these guns be used for the purpose of "keeping peace at the polls." The distance of the forts, especially the outer forts, from the polling places, even in the lower part of New York City, is so great that it will be impossible for a shell to reach them; and I hope the interest of gentlemen on the other side in the city of New York is great enough to induce them to vote for this appropriation, so that in the event of a foreign war we can defend ourselves against the enemy without calling upon the brawny men of the West and the South to bare their bosoms.

Mr. CLYMER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "and fabrication of heavy rifle." I trust the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] will accept this amendment.

Mr. McCOOK. I accept it as a modification.

Mr. CLYMER. I do not say that even with this modification I will vote for the proposition of the gentleman from New York. But we certainly are not now in a condition to enter upon the fabrication of heavy rifle-guns. Any appropriation of this kind should, in my opinion, be confined to the conversion of smooth-bore guns. It is a matter of judgment for the Committee of the Whole whether any larger amount than that named in this bill should be appropriated for this purpose; but I know that Mr. Hewitt, of New York, to whom the gentleman has referred, was of opinion that we should not appropriate anything for heavy rifle-guns at this time.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] who offers this amendment seems to think the harbor of New York and perhaps some other harbors in the country are in danger. Now, gentlemen should remember that we have a general appropriation bill, passed at the last session of Congress, known as the "fortification bill," in which provision is made for the defense of our harbors.

So far as this item is concerned, the estimates were for a larger sum than $50,000. It is suggested that the terms used in the bill are not sufficiently explicit. It says "smooth-bore guns." Of course it means smooth-bore cannon, and not small-arms. We have, as is well known, a large number of smooth-bore cannon on hand, which our officers desire to convert into rifled guns. This work is somewhat experimental; yet it is proposed to be done with a view to their improvement. To meet that desire the sum of $50,000 is appropriated. They could of course spend a million of dollars in the improvement of that class of guns; but the question is how much do we want now, looking to all the surroundings, to expend upon this particular item of the conversion of smooth-bore guns, &c.? There may be men in the United States having founderies who would like to get into a business of this sort? I do not pretend to charge any gentleman upon this floor, or out of this House, with a desire to encourage any expenditure of money to do this work simply that they may have jobs, but we must look at this question as it stands before us. The Army appropriations this year are in excess of those made for the previous year, and in fact are very high. The Treasury is not in the best condition to meet them. We have had propositions here to issue additional interest-bearing bonds to raise money for a particular appropriation. My people will not sanction the issue of any further interest-bearing indebtedness, and were they to do so I could not be their instrument to carry it out, for I am unalterably opposed to such policy. The Treasury being in this condition, shall we in this item of appropriation for the improvement, or in experimenting for the improvement, of these old smooth-bore cannon by our appropriations largely increase expenditures? I think it eminently unwise and unjust to do so.

I remember the Chief of Ordnance, Captain Benét, (I think I state him correctly,) said, "Whatever you give me in that item I will expend as judiciously as I can. If you give me more money I will spend more, but I will act strictly up to the appropriation." We thought the Treasury would not warrant for this purpose this year more than $50,000, and acted accordingly. In that I think we did wisely and well.

I wish to direct the attention of gentlemen to this further fact. This identical clause has once passed this House in the appropriation bill for the year designated in this bill. It also passed the Senate. It has been approved, therefore, by both branches of Congress, and was not a question upon which there was any conflict of opinion at the last session. I do not think, therefore, that we should now interfere with it.

Mr. McCOOK. I have only a word to say in regard to what has been stated by the gentleman from Illinois. If I understand General Benét the conversion of smooth-bore guns has passed beyond being a mere experiment, and has been decided and pronounced a success in converting them into eight-inch rifle-guns. The only other question to be decided, and it is one I am not competent to determine, is as to the relative merit of breech-loading ordnance——

Mr. SPARKS. Let me interrupt the gentleman a moment. I have had, of course, several interviews with the Chief of Ordnance on this subject, and let me ask the gentleman whether he does not know that we cannot take one of these smooth-bore guns and convert it into that class of guns which will penetrate the armor of vessels of this day? We may improve those old smooth-bore guns very largely, but we cannot make out of them the kind of guns which will go through two feet of solid iron armor.

Mr. McCOOK. I might answer the gentleman in this way, and it is the only way I can, by saying I know from the experience of competent ordnance officers that the present smooth-bore guns are not effective guns; and if the Congress of the United States failed or refused to appropriate sufficient money to go into the manufacture of effective guns, it appears the best thing we could do would be to convert smooth-bore guns into as effective rifles as possible. Because, Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of time and patience and experience to make this conversion, and I think I am clearly within the mark in saying, simply repeating what I have already said, that in the event of war with any first-class maritime power the harbors of this country, other harbors as well as that of New York, will be practically defenseless if we should throw aside our torpedo system, and my idea is that the torpedo system to be effective must be in connection with harbor defense.

Mr. BAKER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, along our northern frontier and on our seaboard we have upward of ninety forts and batteries. These forts and batteries in order to their proper armament need more than thirty-five hundred rifled guns. There is no one who has given any attention to the subject of the fortification of our frontier and seaboard but is aware of the fact that there is no first-class nation on the face of the earth so ill prepared to resist foreign aggression as the United States. We to-day have about one hundred rifled guns converted from ten-inch Rodmans into eight-inch rifles that have a penetrating power of eight inches in a wrought-iron plate. And we are the fortunate possssors of one single twelve-inch gun with a penetrating power of about twelve inches.

There is not a city on the American seaboard that to-day could not be laid under tribute and would not be practically indefensible against a single one of the great iron-clads of any of the first, second, third, fourth, or fifth class nations of Europe.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, there is one thing that has been settled as clearly and definitely as not only science but experience can settle it, and that is that the ten-inch smooth-bore Rodman is capable of being converted and has been converted into an eight-inch rifle that for all practical purposes is equal to an eight-inch Armstrong or an eight-inch Krupp gun. We have about three hundred fifteen-inch smooth-bore guns. Already the plant has been prepared for the conversion of these fifteen-inch smooth-bores into eleven-inch rifles. No one can claim that there is not an imperative want on the part of the National Government with a view to its defense to have these guns speedily converted; and no one that has given attention to the subject can claim that it has not been demonstrated by actual experience that the converted fifteen-inch gun affords an eleven-inch rifle with equal power and equal capacity to the eleven-inch Armstrong or Krupp gun.

Mr. HAWLEY. Not quite.

Mr. BAKER. Yes, it has equal power. My friend says "not quite." I say that through the investigation of this subject and the reports of ordnance officers I am satisfied it has equal power.

Now, sir, the condition of our defenses being as it is and the question having been settled, as it has been settled, of the practical importance of the conversion of these guns, what significance is to be attributed to the argument that is made by my late colleague on the Committee on Appropriations that the Treasury is nearly bankrupt and that we cannot, forsooth, appropriate $50,000 additional for the purpose of providing ourselves with a small additional number of these guns?

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, one word further. Armies can be marshaled on an emergency. Fortifications, earth-works, batteries, can be thrown up by the muscle of men on the spur of an emergency. But, sir, if foreign war happens to fall upon us we cannot on the moment either fabricate new guns or convert old ones so as to meet the emergency until we shall have suffered infinitely more damage than the appropriation of a very much larger sum than this for this particular purpose would now amount to.

I wish to say, as I had the fortification bill during the last session of Congress in my especial charge, and having given the subject mature consideration, I promised myself that with the coming of the new Congress I would use whatever influence I could use to see that we set on foot an organization of such means as would result in providing a reasonable supply of these guns, without which the greatest nation in point of wealth and in point of population is absolutely helpless when confronted by the smallest power on the face of the earth.

Mr. GIBSON. Do these smooth-bore guns belong to the Government?

Mr. BAKER. They do. Of the Rodman guns we have more than a thousand that ought to be converted. We have about three hundred fifteen-inch smooth-bores that ought to be converted. The Government has already at two establishments run by private individuals induced them to provide the plant necessary for the purpose of converting the smooth-bores into rifled guns; but the amount of money that has been provided thus far for the conversion of these guns is so small that one of those establishments, I fear before this year is out, will convert its plant, so that there will be only one establishment in the whole country where smooth-bore guns can be converted. I think this small amount should be added to the amount provided for in the clause.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is known to us all that this appropriation bill is one which legitimately belongs to the last Congress. It is not part of the legislation which will properly come before this body for examination. This House through its appropriate committees has had no opportunity of making any examination into this question. We are here, as I and other gentlemen have already said, under peculiar circumstances. There are certain political issues to which the minds of all of us, of all parties, are directed. I trust, sir, that they will be continued in that direction, and that we will not undertake to discuss the question as to what arms we need or what is the condition of our fortifications.

And, sir, even if we were now engaged in the consideration of this subject, I do not think it would be found that there was any emergency calling for this action. If there is any question about which the people of this country are very little troubled, it is the apprehension of danger from abroad, the apprehension of danger of a foreign war.

I trust, sir, that this House will keep in view simply the political issue involved in this bill. When we get away from this bill we shall reach, perhaps to-morrow, a bill of eighty or ninety pages, covering a multiplicity of subjects. I do trust the House will not undertake in any of these items to increase any of the appropriations without having done itself the justice to appoint committees to examine them. I hope this amendment and all other amendments of this character will be voted down.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. McCOOK; and on a division there were—ayes 94, noes 108.

Mr. McCOOK. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. McCOOK and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 113.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read as follows:

For leveling, clearing, and grading range-ground at Sandy Hook common, building plank roads, targets, cranes, and similar necessaries, and for telegraph poles and wires for ballistic instruments, $5,000.

For quarters for superintendent of the proving-ground at Sandy Hook, $2,500.

Mr. CALKINS. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 299:

SEC. 2. That all officers of the Army of the United States who have served as officers in the volunteer force during the war of the rebellion, or as enlisted men in the Army, regular or volunteer, or in the Navy, shall be, and are hereby, credited with the full time they may have served as such officers or enlisted men in computing their services for pay; and that any officer hereafter retired by reason of wounds received in action shall be retired upon the highest rank, exclusive of brevet rank, actually held by such officer in the regular or volunteer service before retirement.

Mr. SPARKS. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. CALKINS. Before the Chair decides upon the point of order I desire to be heard for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has made the point of order at the proper time, but the Chair thinks that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] ought to be heard.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire only to say that the amendment which I offer is simply to supply an omitted case in the former legislation of Congress. It is the law now that any officer of the volunteer service of the United States who may enlist in the regular Army or in the Navy shall have his services computed for pay for the time that he served in the volunteer forces, but it does not provide that naval officers enlisting in the Army shall have their time of service credited to them in computing their pay, and this amendment is simply to supply an omitted case.

This amendment passed the House as section 48 of the bill of the last session, and I offered it at the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] and several other gentlemen whose attention had been called to the subject. It is simply to do justice to Navy officers who have enlisted in the Army and who are not, under the law as it now stands, entitled to be credited with the time they served in the Navy. I hope under these circumstances that the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SPARKS. Does the gentleman say that this proposed amendment passed the House at the last session? If so, it must have been stricken out in the Senate.

Mr. CALKINS. It was put in by Mr. Hewitt, of New York.

Mr. SPARKS. On what page of the bill is it to be found?

Mr. CALKINS. I have not the bill before me.

Mr. SPARKS. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I do not see it in the bill at all.

Mr. CALKINS. I saw it a moment ago.

Mr. SPARKS. It does not appear to be in the bill as it passed the House at the last session, so far as I have examined it.

Mr. CALKINS. I beg the gentleman's pardon, it is.

Mr. SPARKS. Then it must have been one of the clauses relating to the reorganization of the Army, which is stricken out of the present bill.

Mr. CALKINS. No; it followed that.

Mr. SPARKS. I have the bill of last session before me and cannot find any such provision in that place.

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman will look at section 48 he will find it.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I insist on my point of order.

Mr. BAKER. The gentleman will find it on page 30 of the bill, section 48.

Mr. SPARKS. Yes; I see it. But the gentleman is mistaken. As I have stated, it was a part of the reorganization, all of which was stricken out by the Senate.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman is at fault in his recollection.

Mr. SPARKS. I am not. I have the bill before me, and find it as one of the reorganization clauses.

Mr. CALKINS. It was in the original bill, and is as follows:

And that any officer hereafter retired by reason of wounds received in action shall be retired upon the highest rank, exclusive of brevet rank, actually held by such officer in the regular or volunteer service before retirement.

Mr. SPARKS. The proposition made by the gentleman is known as section 48, and was, as I have stated, one of the reorganization clauses attached to the bill, and was stricken out by the Senate. It passed the House as a part of the bill in what was known as "the reorganization of the Army" part of the bill, all of which was stricken out by the Senate.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment now suggested by the gentleman in my judgment is certainly subject to a point of order, and I make it. My point of order is that the amendment is new legislation and not in the line of retrenchment.

Mr. WHITE. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] will allow me, I will say that the gentleman from Indiana who now offers this amendment [Mr. CALKINS] at the last session when this bill was before the House offered the same amendment which he now offers, and it was accepted on all sides. As he has properly stated, it simply corrects a manifest omission in the law now providing for the retirement of officers of the Army.

Mr. CALKINS. In regard to the point of order, I will say that I do not know but what my amendment is as germane to this bill making appropriations for the support of the Army as any of the several provisions which follow such appropriations. As to the other point of order, that it is not in the line of retrenchment, I have had occasion before to remark that that is a relative term; it means very much or very little at different times. At least my amendment does not increase the appropriations or expenditures of the Government, and simply does justice to a class of men to whom we ought to do justice. I am sorry my friend insists upon his point of order, though I do not think it is well taken.

Mr. SPARKS. I insist upon the point of order, and ask the Chair to rule upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] makes the point of order that the proposed amendment changes existing law and does not upon its face retrench expenditures. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken, and rules the proposed amendment out of order.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to cause all the regulations of the Army and general orders now in force to be codified and published to the Army, and to defray the expenses thereof out of the contingent fund of the Army.

SEC. 3. And the examiner of State claims in the office of the Secretary of War shall have, while on such duty, the pay, emoluments, and allowances of mounted officers one grade higher than that held by him in his regiment or corps.

SEC. 4. That when a vacancy occurs in the office of professor of the French language or in the office of professor of the Spanish language in the Military Academy, both these offices shall cease, and the remaining one of the two professors shall be professor of modern languages; and thereafter there shall be in the Military Academy one, and only one, professor of modern languages; and that section 1336 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by inserting, after the word "service" in the first line, the words "as professor."

SEC. 5. That each member of the next two graduating classes of the Military Academy, after graduation, may elect to receive the gross sum of $750 and mileage to his place of residence; and the acceptance of this gross sum shall render him ineligible to appointment in the Army until two years after his graduation; and the amount required to defray the expenditure herein provided for shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

No amendments were offered.

Mr. SPARKS. In pursuance of an agreement made some time since, I ask that the Clerk omit for the present the reading of section 6.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War be authorized to issue to any established college or university of the United States having at the same time not less than one hundred and fifty male students, at his discretion and under proper regulations to be prescribed by him, out of any small-arms or pieces of field artillery belonging to the Government, and which can be spared for that purpose, such number of the same as may appear to be required for military instruction and practice by the students of such college or university; and the Secretary shall require a bond in each case in double the value of the property for the care and safe-keeping thereof, and for the return of the same when required.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend line 2 of the section just read by striking out the word "of" and inserting the word "in" before the words "the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to further amend by striking out the word "or," between the words "college" and "university," and inserting after the word "university" the words "or other higher institution of learning."

Mr. SPARKS. I guess we had better look into that a little.

Mr. DUNNELL. When this bill was pending in the last session I moved a like amendment, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. Hewitt, who had charge of the bill at that time, consented to the amendment.

We are all aware of the fact that in most of the States, perhaps in every State of the Union, there are one or more institutions of learning not designated as colleges or universities to which this provision might apply, to which these officers might well be detailed; institutions holding a rank equal to the college or university that may be in the same State. In my own State, for instance, we have a school called the Shattuck Grammar School. It is the institution where the young men of the State are largely fitted for college. It is the Latin school of the State—a private institution. Heretofore that school has had an officer detailed to give instruction in military tactics. It may as properly apply for such an officer as either the college or the university in the State.

In a great many of the States there are normal schools, and no institution designated as university or college, which normal schools might desire to have an officer detailed for instruction in military tactics. I can see no harm growing out of this amendment, and if it is adopted then the order will be preserved, "college, university, or other higher institution of learning." It simply broadens the scope of this section, and I can see no harm that can grow out of it.

Mr. CLYMER. Allow me to say to the gentleman that his amendment would defeat the object he has in view; "college, university, or other higher institution of learning." The word "higher" would seem to mean an institution higher in rank than a university or college. I think he should make it "other institution of learning."

Mr. DUNNELL. In common language, a higher institution of learning is an institution of learning higher than the public schools.

Mr. CLYMER. I grant that; but you say "college, university, or higher institution of learning;" that is, higher than a university or college. I think the amendment of the gentleman in its present shape would defeat his object.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then I will strike out the word "higher."

Mr. SPARKS. The object of this section will be readily perceived by gentlemen. It provides that the United States Government shall, when requested, distribute a certain amount of arms and military appliances to certain institutions of learning; in other words, loan them to those institutions. Now, if these arms are to be loaned to these institutions, the question readily occurs, what character of institutions shall receive them?

We have in the United States a number of highly reputable and largely patronized colleges and universities, and to this class of institutions the section in the bill proposes to loan the arms, &c. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] wants to enlarge the scope of this section so as to include a lesser grade of institutions. This whole thing, sir, is something of an experiment; the whole project is new. The Government proposes to loan its property to certain institutions of learning, not connected with the Government, known as colleges and universities having each an attendance of one hundred and fifty students, to aid them in imparting military education. The gentleman from Minnesota proposes to amend so that it will read "colleges, universities, or other higher institutions of learning," and at the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CLYMER] be further strikes out the word "higher" and leaves it "other institutions of learning."

Mr. DUNNELL. I would insert the word "incorporated" in the place of "higher."

Mr. SPARKS. That would embrace what? All of the academies of the United States, all of the seminaries, all of the schools above common schools, and you would have thousands of applications for these arms, &c., from thousands of these kinds of institutions.

Now, sir, this section has been proposed in order to accommodate some of the very high and prominent institutions of the country, and I can see where it may be to them an advantage without material prejudice to the Government. It does not specify any one in the country or any part of the country, but is confined to high and prominent institutions that have a large attendance of students that are supposed to teach something whereby this loaned material of the Government would be beneficially used. The gentleman's amendment would enlarge it to embrace all the minor academies and seminaries, and therefore make it endless, boundless in extent, and thereby in my opinion destroy all hope of any substantial or beneficial purpose to be attained by it.

I think the experiment (for it is no more) ought to be confined to the limits proposed by the language used in the section as it now stands. That, certainly, is broad enough. We will then be doing enough on the part of the National Government for private institutions of learning. Under that limitation there will doubtless be a hundred or more applications. To enlarge it might prove to be detrimental to the service of the Government, and would certainly be ruinous to the proposition itself.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the amendment as modified be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "or," after "college," in line 2, and after the word "university" insert the following: "or other incorporated institution of learning."

The amendment was not agreed to; there being—ayes 50, noes 86.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "artillery" in line 6, the words "and shelter-tents."

Mr. SPARKS. I see no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend by adding at the end of the section the following:

Provided, Such college shall not be located within two miles of any place of holding elections for presidential electors or members of Congress.

[Laughter.]

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia. I move to amend by striking out the words "and fifty;" so as to read "not less than one hundred male students." I will say, as the reason for offering this amendment, that in some of the States there are universities or colleges which are in their incipiency. Such is the fact in my own State, where we have an institution of this class with sometimes over a hundred students, sometimes not quite a hundred; yet it is one of those institutions of learning at which, under the act of Congress, instruction in military tactics is given. I submit that this amendment is a proper one.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 83, noes 89.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia, and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 87.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to strike out the whole section. I do so in the interest of economy.

Mr. WHITE. Before that motion is entertained I wish to submit an amendment to perfect the section.

Mr. HAWLEY. If we strike it all out there is no need of bothering about perfecting it.

Mr. WHITE. The practice has been to entertain a motion to perfect the text of a bill in preference to a motion to strike out. That is the parliamentary rule, I submit.

The CHAIRMAN. Pending the motion to strike out the section, it is in order for the friends of it to perfect it. The Chair will entertain the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WHITE. I move to amend by striking out the word "or" after the word "college," and inserting, after the word "university," the words "or State normal school." I desire to submit one word in explanation of this amendment. There is a question whether under the language of the statute of 1866 providing for the detail of Army officers to different colleges and universities in the United States the normal schools existing by virtue of acts of incorporation in the different States—State institutions for the education of teachers—could receive the benefits of this provision. Now in my own State of Pennsylvania we have twelve State normal-school districts, all of which have State institutions in them, and I submit that if any institutions in the country are to be entitled to the provisions of this section, these institutions should be. To relieve all doubt upon the question, I submit this amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I have been a little surprised to see my friends on the other side of the House voting so much together and so strongly in favor of "colleges or universities of the United States." It is the first time I have seen these State-rights gentlemen vote to arm anything belonging to the United States.

A MEMBER. The language of the section is "in the United States."

Mr. CONGER. I have the section before me, and it reads, "any established college or university of the United States."

Mr. ELAM. That has been amended by striking out "of" and inserting "in."

Mr. CONGER. Well, I have been wondering very much to see my friends on the other side rushing blindly on to vote for arming anything belonging to the United States.

Mr. SPARKS. The clerk made a mistake in drafting the bill by inserting the word "of" instead of the word "in." That mistake was discovered an hour or two ago, and corrected. The gentleman from Michigan has just discovered it.

Mr. CONGER. I am very glad to know at least that I was right in my opinion of members on the other side, that they would not knowingly vote anything in the shape of arms or power to anything that might belong to the United States. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. WHITE, there were—ayes 67, noes 69; no quorum voting.

Mr. WHITE. I insist upon a further count. I understand that this amendment is accepted by the gentleman who has this bill in charge.

Mr. SPARKS. It was not accepted by me. I voted against it, and will do so again if I have a chance.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WHITE and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 68.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I now renew my motion to strike out the whole section, and I do it upon the grounds of economy. I do so because the present law is abundantly sufficient for any reasonable accommodation to these colleges and universities. Section 1225 of the Revised Statutes provides that the President may, upon the application of any established college or university, detail some military officer to give military instruction, and the Secretary of War is authorized to issue a sufficient number of small-arms or pieces of field artillery as may appear to be required for military instruction and practice by the students of any such college or university, but they are required to give proper bonds in each case for their safe return. As the section is in this bill now you will be liable to be called upon to send a section or a full battery of artillery to every "one-horse" college in the land, and not to be invidious I will say we have them in our section as well as in other sections and you will never see those guns again in the world. They will be of no other use except to fire Fourth of July salutes. They are worth $500 apiece, and you might just as well throw away a million dollars as to pass this proposition. If you wish to do anything for military education in our colleges and universities it ought to be done in a more sensible way. The present law is abundant to answer the purpose of any college which will make good use of these guns.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill, unless he wishes to go further to-night, that we agree to a motion the committee rise so the House may adjourn.

Mr. SPARKS. There are only three sections, which we can get through with in a little while.

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will yield to the motion to rise.

Mr. SPARKS. We can get through with these three remaining sections in a little while.

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps gentlemen on this side of the House would like to get together to converse. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS. If gentlemen desire it on that side of course I will move the committee rise.

Mr. CONGER. The Hall is occupied generally by our brethren on that side in the evening and we thought we would have to take it in the afternoon.

Mr. SPARKS. I move the committe rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SPARKS. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. TUCKER. I wish to offer a resolution providing for the printing of the census bill.

Mr. KEIFER. I also wish to offer a resolution, to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. COX. I insist on the regular order.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at three o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 28, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

IOWA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the memorial of J. J. Wilson, claiming to have been elected a Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress from the State of Iowa. I ask the memorial be printed in the RECORD, and then I will offer a resolution in reference thereto.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the said petition, with the certificates of said election now in the hands of the Clerk of the House, be referred to the Committee of Elections, when the same shall have been appointed.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

The SPEAKER. This is a question of privilege touching the right of a member to a seat on this floor. Perhaps the gentleman did not hear it.

Mr. CONGER. I did not hear the memorial.

The SPEAKER. The memorial will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives:

The undersigned, a resident and elector of the ninth congressional district of the State of Iowa, respectfully represents that at an election held in said congressional district of said State of Iowa on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1878, in compliance with the general law of the United States designating the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November as the day for such election of Representatives in Congress, your petitioner was duly elected by a majority of the legal votes cast at such election to represent said ninth congressional district of said State of Iowa in the Forty-sixth Congress now assembled.

That your petitioner further represents that certificates of such election, showing the number of votes cast, and for whom voted, duly certified by the judges of such election in the townships and precincts in which such election was held, were forwarded to the Clerk of the House of Representatives prior to the 4th day of March, A. D. 1879. That said Clerk of the House, being governed in his official action by established precedents, at the organization of the present House enrolled the names of those members only as appeared on the certificates of the governor of the State in which such election was held; and as the executive of said State of Iowa saw fit to issue certificates to those persons only who were chosen at an election held in the month of October preceding the general election held in November last, your petitioner was excluded from participation in the organization of the House by the official action of the Clerk of the House aforesaid in consequence of your petitioner's failure to obtain the certificate of the governor of the State aforesaid.

Your petitioner, therefore, respectfully requests your honorable body to take such action as will give to him his legal rights as Representative of the ninth congressional district of said State of Iowa in the Forty-sixth Congress, to which he is entitled by virtue of an election held in conformity to the laws of the United States on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1878.

J. J. WILSON.

ALGONA, KOSSUTH COUNTY, IOWA, March 20, 1879.

Mr. CONGER. In reference to the point I made a few moments ago I wish to say that that is a matter that does not come before this House with any of the usual sanctions attaching to a contestant. As I understand, upon a vote at some pretended election of some two hundred and fifty among thirty thousand voters this man sends up this petition and this claim, that it should come before the House as a question of privilege. Sir, such a farce as that, until the case of Belford and Patterson, could never have been claimed as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no judgment as to whether it is a farce or not. The Chair recognizes the fact that it is a question of privilege touching the seat of a member upon this floor; and the Chair is advised that accompanying the petition there is a certificate of election.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. PRICE. There is no certificate of election. It is a perfect farce, the whole thing.

The SPEAKER. The Chair expresses no opinion on that.

Mr. PRICE. There is nothing at all on which to base a claim to the seat.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CONGER. It will be time enough when the committees are appointed. This does not on its face, to my mind, show any case of privilege any more than any common petition.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] has stated that this election under which the petitioner claims to have been elected a Representative to the Forty-sixth Congress was a farce. But if I have read the accounts in the newspapers aright the gentleman himself thought the November election sufficiently important to be himself a candidate at it for election, and submitted himself to the people at that election as well as at the October election for their approval, the result being that he was elected at both elections, in October and in November.

Now, then, this is a question of law. It is not a farce. It simply turns upon the question whether this Congress may prescribe by law the day upon which the election for Representatives in Congress shall be held, and whether that law when passed by Congress is binding upon all the States or not. That is the question; and there is no ground upon which the gentleman can claim that that election in November was a farce, that it was held on the day prescribed by law. All that is desired by the memorial is that the matter be referred to the Committee of Elections of this House, when appointed, so that the committee may report the law and the facts to the House.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to reply to the gentleman from Illinois in reference to one or two points in this case. In the first place the petition sets forth two things which are not true. It states that there was a general election in the State of Iowa in November. That is not true. There is no foundation of fact upon which to base that statement. The next allegation is that I participated in an election in November. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois and to all other gentlemen who hold his views and opinions on that subject, that the only thing that was done in my district on the 5th of November was this: a few gentlemen who held the political opinions of the gentleman from Illinois had conspired together in a few democratic precincts in that district to assemble and do just what has been done in this case; that is, to cast a few hundred votes and send up a man here to contest my seat upon this floor, as is now sought to be done in my colleague's case. And my friends, who get up as early and sit up as late as the opposition do, got together on the same day and cast for me a few thousand more votes than the opposition did, and thus prevented any contest from my district. There was no general election and no election except in that way.

Mr. SPRINGER. Was that done by your consent?

Mr. PRICE. I did not object to it. I propose always, when gentlemen come upon the arena, to meet them with their own weapons, and I propose not only to meet them but to beat them.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Why not let the memorial be referred?

Mr. PRICE. Let me state further that the only election under which I claimed a seat was the October election, and I am on the record in writing in two separate instances to that effect; and these votes cast for me in November were for the purpose of avoiding what the House has before it to-day, a farce, and nothing but a farce, a claim to be elected where no general election was held, where there was no election, but a few men met together and cast 250 or 260 votes for some man who claims under that paper a seat.

Mr. COX. I rise to a question of order. It is that the merits of this election are not to be discussed upon a point which concerns the privilege and the organization of this House. These belong to the committee to which the case should be referred, the Committee of Elections. I do not see why this debate should spring up on the simple question of the reference of a memorial relating to the organization of the House.

Mr. PRICE. Let me say that when a contestant comes here he comes with notice to the sitting member. When he comes in that way he will doubtless have a hearing before the Committee of Elections. But this man does not come here with a certificate. He does not come here under any shadow or form of law. If that can be tolerated in this House, there are a thousand men in the United States who can come here with as good a right to claim a seat on this floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa that this petition involves a question of State rights, and I am glad to see the gentlemen on the other side such strenuous advocates of the right of a State to fix its own day of election, even against a law of Congress.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman from Illinois ought to know that he is misstating the facts in the case.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand the facts in the case.

Mr. PRICE. The act of Congress provided that any State whose constitution fixes the time for holding election for State officers should not be included in that act of Congress fixing November as the time for electing members of Congress. The constitution of the State of Iowa does provide that the second Tuesday in October shall be the day for holding the election for governor, lieutenant-governor, State officers, and members of the Legislature of that State.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he has allowed the debate to wander from the point at issue, which is, whether this is or is not a question of privilege.

Mr. CONGER. That is the only point I spoke to, and I have not quite said all I wished to say upon that subject.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan wish to speak further upon that point?

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir; and I think that is the only question to be decided here. I made a remark, and I repeat it now, that this petition, or this memorial, coming as it does to this House, is worthy of reception, is worthy of having its proper place of hearing. No member here I think intends to be a more strict advocate of the right of petition and of a respectful hearing of every memorial or petition from any of the people of the United States than I do; but what is this in itself? It is simply the petition or memorial of an individual. I do not care what facts it sets forth so far as the question of privilege is concerned. It simply asks for a hearing, and it should go to the petition-box and be referred in the usual way. It is not even addressed to the Speaker, so that he could be asked to present it to the House.

I said that until the Colorado case of Belford and Patterson every member of this House would have looked upon the subject-matter of this petition as a farce, to be treated lightly enough for its subject, but seriously enough because it is a petition; but in that case there was importance given to such a question as was presented in it as might take it out of the common order of petitions, and it was sustained by the party in power in this House; but, sir, that does not alter the duty of the Chair in regard to his decision as to the character of a paper of this kind. All that can be said is that here is a petition containing certain matters, into which this House may examine, and under our rules its place, its only possible place, its only possible mode of getting before the House, is through the petition-box.

Now it may involve a question; it may involve a subject of law, and when brought up at the proper time, in a proper manner, and referred in the proper way, a question of privilege. I do not deny that, but that it presents a question of privilege in itself I do deny.

Mr. SPRINGER. One word in reference to the question of privilege. The ordinary petitions that come to the House are from citizens praying the enactment of certain laws. These petitions go into the petition-box under the rules; but this petition is based upon a different matter entirely, namely, the right of a member to a seat upon this floor.

The Constitution of the United States gives to each House the right to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and in the rules under the head of "privileged questions" the very second matter stated as a privileged question is the right of a member to be seated, and that has always been regarded as a question of the highest privilege in this House and in the Senate, and to present a memorial or petition from any person claiming to be a member of this House and to have that paper considered by a committee.

The memorialist in this case simply complied with the precedents and sent to a member of the House for presentation to this House this memorial which has been read, and I simply propose that it be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed, so that they may examine the case.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to ask my colleague what difference there would be in the power of the Committee of Elections whether this petition went to them through the petition-box or as he proposes to send it to them?

Mr. SPRINGER. I suppose that in either case they can consider it.

Mr. CONGER. I was about to say on that very point that if the petition be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed, there is no loss of any right, but here is a resolution accompanying it, this petition, which makes it a question of privilege.

I only object to this now in that it is not material which way it goes, but because by such questions we entangle the House and call for peculiar judgments of the Chair. I esteem it very desirable that the line between questions of privilege coming from individual petitions and the right of members to be safe in their seats here until the proper forms of law are complied with should be protected by the Chair.

The Speaker is bound to protect any member of this House, even from the advance of an assault, with the same pertinacity that he does his own prerogative. And members cannot be endangered in their rights to seats here by the admission of artfully drawn resolutions and by decisions of the Chair.

Mr. PRICE. Will the Chair hear me one moment?

Mr. COX. After the election of Speaker the question of highest privilege in this House is the right of a member to a seat. The right to elect members of this House lies at the basis of representative government. We must build from the foundation.

The Speaker will recognize this memorial, not to be put into the box like an ordinary petition, but to be placed before this Chamber and before the public because it is a part of the foundation of our representative system. It is a question of privilege, of the highest privilege, and it should not be shuffled away into a box like ordinary memorials.

I think, therefore, that the Speaker will be right if he determines that this is a question of privilege to be referred to a committee which shall hereafter be constituted for the purpose of examining into the matter of the election of members of Congress.

Mr. PRICE. Gentlemen seem to confuse two very different propositions in their remarks upon this subject. That the right of a member to a seat on this floor is a question of the highest privilege no one disputes; that is a question well settled. And it is equally well settled that the road to that right has been definitely established. The laws of the United States declare how a person shall contest for the possession of a seat on this floor.

Now, if this be a contest, then let the law be pursued. If it is simply a petition, let it go into the petition-box and be referred as other petitions are referred. I undertake to say that no contest for a seat on this floor can be made in this way under the laws that now govern us and under the practice of the House.

A person to institute a contest must file his notice on the sitting member a certain number of days; evidence must be taken, and the question then goes before the Committee of Elections to be examined and determined by them and reported to this House. That course has not been pursued in this case. The only question here is whether that petition shall go to the petition-box as other petitions go, and whether the person who claims a seat against the sitting member shall pursue the course established by the practice of the House and by the laws.

The SPEAKER. It is not in dispute that at some time this memorialist has a right to be heard touching his claim to a seat on this floor. If he can present that right at one time he can present it at all times.

In this case a member of this House, in his capacity as a Representative, rises in his place and presents a memorial, accompanied by a resolution, which resolution has reference actually to a certificate of the election of a person to a seat on this floor, which certificate is now in the custody of the Clerk.

Mr. PRICE. The Chair will excuse me for interrupting him; but would it make any difference if there was no such certificate? I claim that there is none.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not acquainted with the fact further than it is alleged. The Chair therefore recognizes that this is a question of privilege, not so much upon the fact of the memorial as upon the fact of the certificate which is in the custody of the Clerk.

Mr. CONGER. Permit me to ask the Chair if there has been any statement here that there has been any such certificate? I understand it was admitted there was none.

The SPEAKER. The resolution distinctly states that there is one, and asks for the reference of the certificate of election now in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. CONGER. I will ask for the production of that certificate before we have any ruling on this subject.

Mr. PRICE. Because if there is no certificate it will change the phase of the matter entirely.

The SPEAKER. This is on the question of a reference. The decisions of the House and the rules of the House under which those decisions have been given are uniform and without variance, so far as the Chair is advised. It is that the certificate of an election for a seat on this floor is a question of privilege, and has the right to be presented at any time.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to interrupt the Chair at all or to be captious, but I have heard nothing in relation to a certificate of this memorialist.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair suggests to the gentleman that he did not pay attention to the reading of the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. I will ask that the resolution be again read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That said petition, with the certificate of said election now in the hands of the Clerk of the House, be referred to the Committee of Elections when the same shall have been appointed.

Mr. CONGER. Ah! that is the certificate of the sitting member.

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. CONGER. Then I ask that the certificate may be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] certainly made the statement that the certificate was in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know that the certificate or papers on this subject are in the hands of the Clerk. I only know that the petitioner has asked that all the papers relating to this case and to the election in that district be referred to the Committee of Elections. If there are no papers in the hands of the Clerk, then nothing will be referred. But this reference will take before the committee the papers relating to the right of the sitting member, because that is an adverse right to the one set up by the petitioner. By this reference all the papers relating to the election in the ninth congressional district in Iowa will go to the Committee of Elections for the purpose of consideration and report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has sent for the RECORD containing the statement of the Clerk at the organization of the House in reference to the papers in this case.

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not know what the papers in the hands of the Clerk are; I have not examined them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has sent for the Clerk's statement.

Mr. SPRINGER. Nor do I know whether there is a certificate purporting to show that the memorialist is elected. No such certificate was ever issued by the governor of Iowa, I am quite sure. If there are any papers on file with the Clerk they are perhaps the certificates of some of the election officers in the counties where the election was held. But so far as that is concerned, it has been universally held by this House that the certificate of a governor is not necessary to give validity to the election of a Representative in Congress. There are instances where the governor having declined to issue any certificate at all this House has adjudged who was elected.

Mr. CONGER. That is making an entirely new issue.

Mr. SPRINGER. In several cases from the State of Tennessee members were seated on this floor upon the certificates of the sheriffs of one or two counties in the district in the absence of other evidence of the result of the election.

The SPEAKER. And gentlemen have taken their seats on this floor upon the certificate of a military commander.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman admits that there is no certificate of any kind in favor of this memorialist.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have read what the Clerk of the House stated at the time of the organization.

The Clerk read as follows:

In reference to the State of Iowa, the Clerk also begs the indulgence of the Representatives-elect while he makes a statement as to the reasons by which he was controlled in placing upon the roll the names of the gentlemen he has just called as Representatives-elect from Iowa. There were presented to the Clerk certificates duly signed by the governor of the State of Iowa, under the seal of the State, accrediting the nine gentlemen whose names have been announced as Representatives duly elected on the 8th day of October, 1878. Sundry papers were also presented to the Clerk in reference to an election claimed to have been held on the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November, 1878. These papers, however, do not conform to the requirements of the laws of Iowa. They are not signed by the governor; they are not under the seal of the State; they are simply papers which came unauthenticated and in no sense constitute credentials within the meaning of the laws of Iowa. Whatever may be the fact, therefore, in reference to the time at which the election should have been held in the State of Iowa, even though it were definitely and clearly settled that the election should have been held in November instead of October, the Clerk could not in any event place on the roll the names of those persons in whose behalf papers have been filed in reference to the November election for the reason that these papers do not comply with the laws of the State of Iowa and do not constitute credentials.

Mr. PRICE. You will see, Mr. Speaker, that this very statement of the Clerk shows that the papers presented are unauthenticated, not in conformity with law—have no force or binding effect.

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

As to whether the election should have been held in October or in November, there are grave doubts in the minds of those learned in the law. It is a question about which he confesses he has not been able to arrive at so clear and satisfactory a conclusion as he could himself have desired. But in the discharge of the duty imposed upon him, unless he could arrive at a clear and satisfactory conclusion that those gentlemen were not elected on the proper day, he did not feel at liberty to withhold their names from the roll of members-elect, but thought it proper to give the benefit of the doubt in favor of representation, and to remand that question for the consideration of the House when it shall have organized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that he cannot see how the right of a person to be heard on this floor in reference to his right to a seat can be abridged or interfered with by any decision which the Clerk may have made in placing the names on the roll in pursuance of law. The rule which governs the Chair in this case is laid down as follows:

Whenever the Speaker is of opinion that a question of privilege is involved in a proposition, he must entertain it in preference to any other business, such opinion of course being subject to an appeal; and when a proposition is submitted which relates to the privileges of the House, it is his duty to entertain it, at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege.

The Constitution declares that this House "shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members." Now, for the Chair to deny a hearing to any person seeking a seat on this floor, claiming that he is entitled to it in preference to one who is already seated, would be an infringement upon the right which is guaranteed to the citizen in the Constitution itself. The Chair therefore considers that under the rules this is a question of privilege and entertains the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER rose.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will not be too much in a hurry, because I have learned that he can wait when required to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will protect the gentleman from Michigan in his rights.

Mr. CONGER. I do not rise to renew the discussion on the point of order, or to appeal from the decision of the Chair. But admitting that decision in all its force, I make another point. This resolution attacks the right of a member to his seat on this floor. A member, having come here with a proper certificate of election, acknowledged by this House to be in conformity to law, has been sworn in and is now seated here in the full enjoyment of all his rights as a member. Those rights are attacked by this resolution.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would prefer to hear the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I am speaking to a point of order; and I do not think that one point of order can come on top of another.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has raised no point of order. He is speaking to no question.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot give the gentleman the power of comprehension; that comes from a higher source.

Mr. COX. From which you never came. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman must wait, and with his powers of mind must study this out himself.

Mr. COX. If the Chair chooses to tolerate the gentleman from Michigan, very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan said that he rose to a question of order, and the Chair is trying to find out exactly the point of order which he submits.

Mr. CONGER. The point I make is this, not disputing the decision of the Chair as to the right of a third person to come and contest the right to a seat upon this floor, that this resolution attacks the right of a sitting member sworn in, and demands his certificate of election be sent to a committee and that a contest shall be commenced in an irregular and unlawful way. It is not necessary at all to ascertain the rights of the memorialist; but by this resolution, while raising the question of a third party, it is proposed to send the sitting member to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will allow the Chair to ask him a question, it is this: Whether he does not consider it in the interest of the sitting member in such a contingency to have his certificate of election also sent to the Committee of Elections?

Mr. CONGER. Whenever in a proper way the right of a sitting member to a seat upon this floor is attacked, then he should be prepared and he should have the right to meet it in the proper way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, and there could be no better way than to meet it with his certificate of election.

Mr. CONGER. But if a member shall by a resolution of this House, by the preconceived views of the majority, if it comes to that, be sent to his contest, it seems to me to be against all the rights of sitting members and adds nothing to the rights of the applicant. Let him, under the decision of the Chair, have his paper sent to the Committee of Elections.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better move the amendment that any papers relating to the sitting member's right to the seat be also sent to the Committee of Elections, and the Chair will entertain it either as an amendment or an original proposition.

Mr. CONGER. I made the point that this goes beyond the question of privilege and attacks the right of a member to a seat upon this floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say, in answer to the gentleman from Michigan, that he thinks it would be unfair to send a number of papers to the Committee of Elections containing allegations against the right of a sitting member, and not send the certificate of that sitting member, if possible, to controvert the statements made in the other papers.

Mr. CONGER. But the majority here in the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Illinois compel the sitting member to be the contestant.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will recognize the right of a member, and it has been frequently done, to compel a member holding a certificate to stand aside before he is sworn in.

Mr. CONGER. But this member has been sworn in.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows that he has. The right of one Representative to question the right to a seat of another has gone to the extent of a sitting member upon this floor demanding that another member presenting himself to be sworn in should stand aside and not be sworn in although he held the certificate of the governor of his State.

Mr. CONGER. If by this decision there may be new forms of contest of a member's seat unknown to the law, if a member may be called to contest his right to a seat in this House by a resolution offered here and sustained by the majority, what possible limit, what security is there to any member? What security is there to the honorable Speaker in the chair if any man may come in by any representation which will involve his right to a seat here and raise the question of his right and make him, during all the time he is acting as Speaker and deciding points of order in this House, hold his seat by a questioned title? There must be some way of bringing these contests legally before the House. We supposed the laws were now sufficient for that purpose; but if they may be made by resolution, if the whole is to be thrown in the power under a question of privilege of the majority of the House to compel every member to contest his seat, then we have passed into dangerous times as to the rights of members to seats upon this floor.

The SPEAKER. Does not the gentleman recollect the resolution of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] touching the right of the member from Florida, as modified, sent the certificate of that member to the Committee of Elections?

Mr. CONGER. That was at the request of the member himself.

The SPEAKER. But that does not alter the right.

Mr. CONGER. The point I make is, that the resolution shall not call in question the right of a member to his seat except in accordance with the forms of law. This is a new proceeding.

The SPEAKER. It is not for the Chair to determine the effect of laws or to administer law.

Mr. CONGER. It is for the Chair to determine the mode of proceeding of this House.

The SPEAKER. The question is a very simple one for the Chair to decide. It is: Does this contain a question of privilege?

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out of the resolution all except that which relates to referring this memorial to the Committee of Elections, when appointed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am entitled to the floor, and move the previous question.

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the Chair what is the question now pending?

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I think the previous question was not called when I made my motion.

Mr. SPRINGER. I held the floor to call the previous question. I wish to say if the right of the sitting member was at all jeopardized by this course, or if any right he has under the Constitution was attacked in the slightest way, I would yield for any amendment or any discussion. But the sitting member is entitled to be heard as to his rights before the committee, and he is not placed on the same footing as the contestant, for he has the right to sit, while the contestant has the right only to be heard. I therefore insist on my motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Michigan state his amendment? The Chair desires the gentleman from Illinois to hear it.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the said petition with the certificates of said election now in the hands of the Clerk of the House be referred to the Committee of Elections, when the same shall have been appointed.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend by striking out the words "with the certificates," &c.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield for that purpose?

Mr. CONGER. Let the memorial simply be referred as a question of privilege under the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield for that amendment?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, then, will state to the gentleman from Michigan that his remedy is to vote down the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PRICE. Is it not in order to move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. PRICE. If gentlemen refuse to refer only the petition and papers relevant to the case and insist on sending other matters not relevant, then I hope the good sense of the House will lay the question on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if the gentleman from Iowa has no objection, will first submit the question on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PRICE. I withdraw for the present the motion to lay on the table.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 108, noes 99.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question recurred on ordering the main question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 107, noes 100.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SPRINGER. Unless gentlemen on the other side desire delay on this subject, I will yield to any reasonable amendment they may offer in order to save the time of the House.

Mr. CONGER. We do not want any delay; but I desire that only the memorial as a question of privilege under the decision of the Chair shall be sent to the committee when appointed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois accept the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do.

The SPEAKER. The resolution as modified will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That said petition be referred to the Committee of Elections, when the same shall have been appointed.

Mr. SPRINGER. And the papers in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to the reference of all the papers relating to the election in November; but I do not wish to include the certificate of the sitting member.

Mr. SPRINGER. If he does not desire to appear before the committee to defend his right to his seat, or to send his certificate there in order to make out his case, I have no objection.

Mr. CONGER. When the committee calls upon any member to defend his right to his seat it will be time enough for him to do so.

The resolution was then adopted, as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the memorial of John J. Wilson and all papers in the hands of the Clerk relating to the election of Representative in Congress for the ninth congressional district of Iowa on the 5th of November, 1878, be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CENSUS ACT.

Mr. TUCKER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed 5,000 copies of the act entitled "An act to provide for the taking of the tenth and subsequent censuses," approved March 3, 1879.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. GIBSON. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk for reference to the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Levees and Improvement of the Mississippi River shall be styled the Committee on the Mississippi River and its Tributaries.

Mr. NEAL. I object.

STATIONERY.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to offer a resolution that interests all the members on the floor, and I think when it is read there will be no objection to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House issue to members, officers, and committees of this House such necessary stationery as may be required; and he shall have authority to use any unexpended moneys belonging to the stationery fund to supply necessary articles which are not now on hand; that issued to members to be charged against them and accounted for hereafter.

Mr. FINLEY. That has already been provided for.

Mr. KEIFER. The latter part of the resolution is entirely new. There was a resolution that authorized the issuing of stationery to members, but it did not apply to committees and officers of the House. The resolution was defective in that respect. The other resolution did not authorize the Clerk to purchase any stationery at all, so that there are many things which he has not now and cannot get unless he is permitted to use the money in his hands belonging to the stationery fund.

Mr. FINLEY. I object to the resolution. There is no necessity for it.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I rise to a question of personal privilege. It will be remembered by the House that on the first day of the meeting of this session a memorial was presented by my colleague from the third district charging my colleague from the first district and myself with crime. Accompanying that memorial was a resolution asking this House to appoint a committee of investigation into the charges made against my colleague and myself.

After some discussion that resolution was amended and passed. The charges made against my colleague and myself, if proved, should send us both to the penitentiary. We felt the sting of this attempt to stain our names, not only here where we are comparatively strangers, but before the community where we reside and are trying to raise our families in a respectable way, our reputations being as dear to us as the apple of our eye.

After the proceedings and action of this body, and smarting under these innuendoes of this attempt on the part of some partisan enemies of ours to besmirch our names, we wrote to our friends and begged them to bring the matter before the grand jury of the county of Hamilton, in which our districts are situated. The prosecuting attorney took the matter in hand. The grand jury was composed of a majority of democrats. The foreman of that grand jury was a distinguished democrat, Hon. Charles Thomas. The day before yesterday they made their final report to the court of common pleas, and I ask that the Clerk read so much of the report of the grand jury as refers to our case.

The Clerk read as follows:

During our session our attention was called to a series of very grave charges made in a memorial to Congress, and published in the daily newspapers in this city, of corrupt practices connected with the conduct of the election in October last. This purported to be signed by many citizens and supported by numerous affidavits. We felt it to be our duty to examine into these alleged practices so dangerous to society, and which ought to be rigorously and promptly punished. We have caused subpœnas to be issued for the appearance before us of all the parties whose names are affixed to the memorial as published and the affiants whose names purported to be signed to the affidavits attached thereto. We have examined over fifty such persons who have appeared in answer to such subpœnas, and from the testimony given by them we have found nothing to warrant our taking any action in the matter.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. Now, Mr. Speaker, my purpose in offering this report is not to prejudice this House or the committee to be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the charges made against us, but that we shall stand fair with those gentlemen with whom we are about to associate until we are expelled. I wanted that extract read simply to show gentlemen who are comparatively strangers to us that in Hamilton County we are not regarded as bad men. [Laughter.] Let us have some standing here. Give us the respect of our colleagues here until this investigating committee which has been ordered shall have completed its duties and made its report.

I ask the pardon of the House for taking up so much of its time in making this personal explanation.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Army appropriation bill. On yesterday in the consideration of the bill we passed over the sixth section with the understanding that perhaps general debate would be required upon that section. My object is to learn what range of debate is desired by gentlemen on the other side of the House. I will state that so far as I am concerned I would prefer that the discussion of the questions involved in that section should be somewhat brief, and that the political discussion likely to be indulged in by the House on these questions may be had mainly on the legislative, executive, and judicial bill when it is introduced. I am quite unwell to-day, and should be unwilling myself to enter on the discussion except for the desire I have to get through with the bill as early as possible. I now desire to learn, if I can, the disposition of the other side of the House upon the subject.

Mr. CALKINS. The time to arrange the limit for debate will be when we reach the sixth section.

Mr. SPARKS. But we shall then be in Committee of the Whole House, and the matter must be determined in the House and not in the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. CALKINS. We can come back into the House then.

Mr. SPARKS. I think we ought to determine what the limit of debate shall be, if we can, now.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest to the gentleman that some gentlemen upon this side of the House have made preparation to speak upon that section, and some of them desire more time perhaps than a limitation to five or ten minutes; but we do not, so far as I understand, wish to take up more time than shall give our friends here an opportunity for what they wish to say on the subject. I suggest to the gentleman that the limit to debate be not fixed now, but we can go along with the bill, and the committee can then rise and limit debate, if it be deemed proper.

Mr. SPARKS. Very well! That being the understanding, I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of further considering the Army appropriation bill. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of War shall be authorized to detail an officer of the Army, not above the rank of captain, for special duty with reference to Indian education.

SEC. 9. That section 6 of the act approved June 18, 1878, making appropriations for the support of the Army, be, and is hereby, repealed: Provided, That when the economy of the service requires, the Secretary of War shall direct the establishment of military headquarters at points where suitable buildings are owned by the Government.

No amendments were offered.

The Clerk read the following:

SEC. 10. That from and after the passage of this act, and until it shall be otherwise provided by law, there shall be no promotions or appointments in the Army above the rank of captain except in the Corps of Engineers, and that no officer below the rank of major shall be transferred to the retired list, except upon the report of a duly constituted board of officers, to the effect that such officer is no longer fit for active service: Provided, That nothing shall prevent the appointment of a Chief of Engineers, with the rank of brigadier-general, when a vacancy shall occur.

Mr. DIBRELL. I move to add to the section just read by the Clerk the following:

Nor shall it prevent the promotion of any captain who has served twenty years in the United States Army.

Mr. SPARKS. I think that amendment is eminently just and should be adopted.

Mr. DIBRELL. It will not affect more than a half dozen officers in the Army. I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to amend section 10, by inserting just before the proviso that which I send to the Clerk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that any officer hereafter retired by reason of wounds received in action shall be retired upon the highest rank (exclusive of brevet rank) actually held by such officer in the regular or volunteer service before retirement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to further amend section 10 by inserting after the words "Corps of Engineers" the following:

And the actual time of service in the Army or Navy of the United States shall be allowed all officers in computing their pay.

The question was taken upon the amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 86, noes 76.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. SPARKS called for tellers.

Mr. BROWNE. I voted for this amendment because it was offered by my colleague, [Mr. CALKINS,] and not because I fully understood its purport or its object. Speaking for myself only, I am satisfied that my colleague had better explain the scope of his amendment so that the House may understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is dividing upon the amendment, and no discussion is in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. WHITE. It is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to make the point of order now, because the committee is dividing upon the amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

Mr. REAGAN. If there is permission to reply.

Mr. BROWNE. Certainly.

There was no objection.

Mr. CALKINS. The only purpose of this amendment, as I stated yesterday, is to supply an omission in the law passed some time ago by Congress allowing all the time of service to be computed in favor of any person who had theretofore served in the volunteer forces of the United States. In that law the words "service in the Navy" were omitted, were left out. The result is that the time which a person has actually served in the Army is allowed to such persons, but nothing is allowed for the time of service in the Navy. Under the law as it now stands, if a naval officer had served one or more years in the Navy and then enlisted in the Army, in computing his longevity pay he receives no credit for the time he has served in the Navy.

That is evidently an omission in the law. It has been corrected several times in this House by unanimous consent, but has not yet been enacted into law. Many officers of the Navy have enlisted for service in the Army, and vice versa. I will now yield the remainder of my time to my friend from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. During the last session of Congress this House passed this proposition in a form that excluded those who participated in the late war. It was passed by the House and by our side of the House, but being connected with objectionable provisions to the Senate it there failed. It is now presented in an unobjectionable form, and is an act of justice to those who served in the Navy. A man who has served in the Army for five years can go into the Navy and get credit for that five years' service. But a man who has served in the Navy for five years and goes into the Army does not get credit for any of the time served in the Navy. This is simply to put naval officers on the same footing with Army officers. I think it is just and ought to pass. We passed it before in an objectionable form. It is now freed from those objections, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. SPARKS. I understand that this amendment or one identical to it was offered yesterday.

Mr. CALKINS. The substance of this amendment is the same as the one offered yesterday, but the language is changed.

Mr. SPARKS. This amendment substantially was offered yesterday to some paragraph of this bill, and it was voted down by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in order; the Chair ruled it out.

Mr. CALKINS. A point of order was made against it yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] himself.

Mr. SPARKS. And that point of order inures against it now.

Mr. BROWNE. Not after the committee have voted on it.

Mr. SPARKS. Well, the point of order having been made on substantially the same thing during a former consideration of this bill, it must attach to and inure to the proposition now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that no point of order having been made upon this amendment it was entertained and the committee proceeded to vote upon it, and the vote by division was announced. Tellers were then demanded, and after the demand for tellers was made the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] asked unanimous consent that his colleague [Mr. CALKINS] who offered the amendment might explain it. Thereupon the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] raised the point of order against the amendment. The Chair stated that the point of order came too late, as the committee was then dividing upon it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The same amendment having been offered yesterday, and the Chair having upon a point of order ruled it out of order, can the point of order be now evaded by subsequently offering the same amendment? Will not the Chair, ex propria motione, hold that this amendment having been once ruled out of order it is now out of order?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The point of order is too late now.

Mr. SPARKS. The point of order was made against what the gentleman says is substantially the same proposition, and the Chair ruled that the point was well taken. When a proposition has been ruled out of order by the Chair can a member go on renewing it upon clause after clause until perhaps attention has been directed to something else and the proposition slips in? When an amendment has been ruled out of order once are we compelled to follow it up and make a point against the same thing a dozen times?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. SPARKS. This identical proposition in substance has been ruled by the Chair to be out of order; and when it is again offered it is certainly the province of the Chair to rule that it is out of order.

Mr. HAWK. Is this discussion in order?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It is too late to raise the point of order after the amendment has been debated and the Committee of the Whole has voted upon it.

Mr. SPARKS. The point was raised yesterday.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to state that the point of order was not made against the amendment in its present form. The point was made yesterday against a whole section which I then proposed to introduce. I have taken from that section these sentences, which I now offer as an amendment to the section now pending. The point of order was not made against this amendment in the form in which it is now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that it is not the province of the Chair to raise points of order upon amendments which are moved by members of the committee. He can only take jurisdiction of questions of order when raised by some member on the floor. When this proposition was moved yesterday a point of order was made upon it at the right time, and the Chair promptly ruled it out of order. If the House had voted yesterday to reject the amendment, the Chair would now hold that it could not be again entertained; if the point of order had been raised in time that this was the same amendment previously offered, the Chair would have held that it could not be offered again, because to allow propositions thus to be repeated would protract business indefinitely. But when this amendment was offered to-day no point of order was raised, the amendment was submitted to a vote of the committee, and the Chair holds that it is too late, after the question has been taken by a division and after tellers have been demanded, to raise a point of order on the amendment. The Chair therefore entertains it; it is before the committee; and if the committee are ready for the question the Chair will again put it upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CALKINS. Tellers have been ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. They have been demanded, but not ordered.

Mr. REAGAN. I think there is some danger in adopting a proposition like this when it is not sufficiently explained, and no one understands just how much money it will take out of the Treasury or whom it is to affect. It ought to have examination by some committee, it ought to have full discussion in the House before we should venture to adopt it. I think it would be very unsafe for us to agree in this way to the amendment when we cannot tell how much money it is to take out of the Treasury.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It takes no money out of the Treasury at present.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman says it takes no money from the Treasury now. I do not understand this mode of treating the question. The very object of the amendment is to give longevity pay and rank pay. It may take no money out of the Treasury to-day; but of course it will take money out of the Treasury. The gentleman does not know how much; and it seems that he is not anxious the House should know. My objection is that we have had no opportunity to examine the proposition. No committee, no member, is prepared to state from any official authority how much money it will take.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. In justice to myself I will state my reason for saying that this amendment takes no money from the Treasury now. This provision is only to take effect in the future; and the cases of transfer of officers from the Navy to the Army are very rare. Only when such a case occurs can there be any computation as to the amount to be expended. Consequently, as I have said, it takes nothing from the Treasury now. It never may take anything, because there may never be a transfer of an officer from the Navy to the Army. For this reason I insist my remark was correct.

Tellers were ordered on agreeing to the amendment; and Mr. CALKINS and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 106, noes 61.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I shall ask a vote on this amendment in the House.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to amend by adding at the end of the pending section the following:

And provided further, That section 1218 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby repealed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve the right to make a point of order until I hear what this section is.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be understood that all points of order are reserved.

Mr. TUCKER. Section 1218 reads thus:

No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Before there is any discussion, I raise the point of order that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been reserved by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

Mr. TUCKER. In reference to the point of order I wish to say that if members of the committee will look at the tenth section of this bill they will find that it reads thus:

That from and after the passage of this act, and until it shall be otherwise provided by law, there shall be no promotions or appointments in the Army above the rank of captain except in the Corps of Engineers, &c.

Now, as germane to the question of promotions and appointments in the Army below the rank of captain, I move an amendment which I trust will meet with universal approbation on both sides of this Chamber, that the stigma which rests upon a very large class of the people of that section of country from which I come, and which I have the honor in part to represent, shall be "wiped out" from the statute-book as a matter of justice now and forever, that in this era of peace and good feeling there shall be no longer a statutory stigma against a large portion of the people of this country; that because they took part in the rebellion they are unworthy to wear a sword in defense of the country; that a man may be in the ranks to carry a musket but that he is unworthy to wear a sword; that I and other gentlemen upon this floor who represent the Southern States are worthy here to make laws, but that there is no man, whether he was under age or over age, who served in any capacity during the civil war, under the Confederate States or under any State in insurrection, who is worthy to be appointed to any position in the Army. I do hope that in this day that provision of the law will be "wiped out" from the statute-book of the United States forever.

The CHAIRMAN. All questions of order were reserved by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserved the point of order, but did not raise it on this amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the gentleman from Georgia did not raise the point of order, and therefore I have made it and insist on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. CONGER. My point is this, that this is new legislation and not germane to the subject-matter of the bill, and is not in the interest of retrenchment by any manner of means. [Laughter.]

I was about to remark that the gentleman from Virginia did not speak in regard to the point of order at all. He made his argument in the interest of that overburdening idea of peace and good-will which overshadows us now like a great cloud just on the eve of a great conflict unlike any other which has been had in this Hall for years.

Mr. TUCKER. The gentleman speaks of peace as a cloud.

Mr. CONGER. Very well; overshadowing us like a cloud of peace. [Laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER. A piece of a cloud.

Mr. CONGER. A peaceful cloud.

Mr. TUCKER. No; a piece of a cloud. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. That kind of a cloud which generally follows a battle and does not precede it, the cloud of smoke and tumult. The gentleman has brought into our peaceful and calm and quiet deliberations to-day, and before we have come to the exciting subject which by common consent was to be postponed until we had allowed ourselves to be harmonized for a few moments [laughter]—the gentleman, I say, has thrown in here the gage of battle; he has had the courage to do what no man has dared to do before in this House and in the presence of the American people; he has had the courage to offer an amendment here which his own brethren on that side have repeatedly said when it was even suggested that it was premature; and when I some time ago charged upon the members of that side that they did look forward to a time when by the reduction of the Army they could make places for the brigadier-generals of the South, I was laughed at scornfully by every democrat on that side.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. CONGER. They said that nobody ever intended to offer such an amendment or propose such a thing.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is more sensitive in regard to what I say than he was in regard to what was said by the gentleman with whom and in reference to whose sentiment he is in such sweet accord. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No, sir. I will say to the gentleman that no point of order was pending against the amendment when the gentleman from Virginia was upon the floor.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair said there was.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. No, sir; the gentleman from Georgia said he reserved all points of order, but there was no point then pending, and I now insist that the gentleman from Michigan is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. I have made the point of order and am stating it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan must confine himself to the question of order.

Mr. CONGER. As in the Committee of the Whole the previous question cannot be ordered, if the Chair should think this is a proper and legitimate amendment, I propose to make some few remarks on this subject if it comes before the committee; and I will therefore say nothing further now on the general question, as my friend from Virginia was permitted to do without objection on this side. I ask the ruling of the Chair upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman from Virginia to send the Statutes to the Clerk's desk, that the section proposed to be repealed may be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1218. No person who has served in any capacity in the military, naval, or civil service of the so-called Confederate States, or of either of the States in insurrection during the late rebellion, shall be appointed to any position in the Army of the United States.

Mr. SPARKS. The amendment is certainly subject to the point of order.

Mr. McCOOK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia a question in regard to the amendment he has offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Relating to the point of order?

Mr. McCOOK. Yes, sir; in reference to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. McCOOK. I understood the gentleman from Virginia to say that the amendment which he offered was germane to the section under discussion because that section prohibited promotions in the Army of the United States above the rank of captain, except in the Corps of Engineers. I believe I state correctly what the gentleman said.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCOOK. Then I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, if it means anything, means this: that in the event of this section of the Revised Statutes being repealed, and in the event of the passage of this bill as it is, with that amendment, all the offices in the Army of the United States above the rank of captain, including the ranks of major, lieutenant-colonel, colonel, brigadier-general, and major-general, can be, may be, and should be filled with gentlemen who at one time served in the confederate army.

Mr. TUCKER. This section prohibits promotions above the rank of captain, except in the Corps of Engineers. But there may be promotions or appointments below the rank of captain.

Mr. GIBSON rose.

Mr. CLYMER. I rise to a question of order. This discussion is not on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion must be confined to the question of order.

Mr. TUCKER. The point of order that is raised against my amendment does not seem to me to be good, for the reason that this bill itself proposes to enact a new law in reference to promotions and appointments in the Army; while my amendment provides that in these appointments and promotions this twelve hundred and eighteenth section shall be abrogated, and that a man who is now in the ranks—and I have such a one in my eye—and who was in the service of the confederate government during its existence in a civil capacity or in the army, may be promoted by the President to a rank below that of captain.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if the effect of this amendment will not be this——

Mr. ATKINS. That is not in the nature of discussing the point of order. I object to this discussion going on.

Mr. KEIFER. I suppose the Chair could not very well decide a question of order unless he knew what the amendment was and what its effect would be. He could not decide without knowing that.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not the province of the Chair to decide the effect of an amendment. He has merely to decide the point of order.

Mr. SPARKS. It is new legislation and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to be heard a moment on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand the effect of the amendment is to change existing law. I understand the effect of it would be to so change existing law as to make ineligible for promotion all of the present officers of the Army of the United States above the rank of captain; and so to amend the law as to make eligible to appointment to those places to which these officers are ineligible persons who were in the confederate army. That is, it operates to exclude officers above the rank of captain from these appointments and to include ex-confederates. It is to that extent a change in the law. That is all I desire to state now. If the amendment should be ruled in order, I desire to be heard further on the question.

Mr. CONGER. At the request of many gentlemen on my side of the House who desire that we should meet this question in a bold and manly way, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SPARKS. I renew it. The position taken by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] is a very peculiar one. The section makes provision that there shall be no promotions or appointments of officers above the rank of captain. That is done for the purpose of curtailing expenditures, with a view simply of running the Army without costing so much money, and still leave an efficient service in the Army. That is the whole of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would ask the gentleman whether that provision which he mentioned a moment ago does not apply only and solely to those now in the Army?

Mr. SPARKS. Precisely.

Mr. MITCHELL. If this amendment were adopted it would not apply to those out of the Army, and therefore those who served in the late confederate army would be eligible; whereas those who served in the Union Army would not be eligible.

Mr. SPARKS. The section of the bill means just what it says. It prevents promotions and appointments. The gentleman from Virginia claims that his amendment is germane, and proposes by it that appointments may be also made from another class of men now excluded by law as well as from the class not excluded. In other words, he proposes to enlarge the number of applicants from which appointments may be made by amending the law so that the disqualified class may be recognized and come in. And the gentleman from Ohio insinuates that its object is to make eligible this excluded class for appointments to a rank beyond that to which under the section the non-excluded class could attain. In other words, he insinuates that it would prevent the promotion of Union soldiers and allow ex-confederates to go in. Now, of course, that view of it is simply ridiculous. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia means no such thing and cannot be tortured into any such construction. But the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is certainly not germane, and cannot and ought not to be entertained. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] made the point of order against it, and now withdraws it. By that I must infer that he desires it to be incorporated as a part of the section. But I renew the point of order. It clearly is not germane, but simply proposes to repeal a statute that cuts off this excluded class of men, and is allowable under the rules; but were it otherwise, a little common sense and a little coolness in looking at the matter would show gentlemen that it would, if adopted, simply put all upon the same level, without discrimination for or against either class. But it is not germane, and is new legislation, and I ask that the point of order may be sustained against it.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to inquire whether the entire section 10 is not out of order; whether it is not new legislation?

The CHAIRMAN. In answer to the question raised by the gentleman from Ohio, the Chair will state that no point of order was made upon section 10.

Mr. FINLEY. But points of order were reserved.

Mr. CARLISLE. It is in order, because by prohibiting promotions it reduces the Army to that extent, and is in the line of retrenchment.

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order was made upon section 10, and the Chair will not rule upon that section, whether it be in order or not. The reserving of points of order does not authorize the Chair to decide upon any section, unless some member raises the point of order upon it.

With reference to the point made by the gentleman from Illinois to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] the Chair is of opinion that although the amendment in the opinion of the Chair is germane to this section, in that it relates to appointments in the Army, yet it does not appear that it would retrench expenditures, and it does appear that it changes existing law; for this reason the Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. KING. I offer the following to go in after section 10:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause a survey to be made above the cities of Vidalia, Louisiana, and Natchez, Mississippi, whose harbors are now threatened with destruction.

For the expenses of said survey, and for such works as may be proposed under it, $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

I ask that the memorial accompanying it be read.

The Clerk began the reading of the memorial.

Mr. CONGER. I object to the reading of the memorial. I insist that it is trifling with the House to attach to an amendment a memorial of citizens anywhere.

Mr. SPARKS. I make the point of order on the amendment itself.

Mr. KING. Let the memorial be read, for it explains the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] may address the committee for five minutes, and have the memorial read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. CONGER. But the point of order is made, as I understand it, upon the amendment, and if the point of order be sustained the gentleman has no right to address the committee.

Mr. SPARKS. I presume the gentleman could not address the committee unless he addressed it on the point of order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the memorial be read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. KEIFER. I cannot see how a memorial prepared by citizens on the Mississippi River some weeks in advance of the meeting of Congress could enlighten the Chair upon a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot anticipate what remarks the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] will make on the point of order. The gentleman is entitled to the floor for the purpose of speaking to the point of order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the memorial be read as an explanation——

Mr. SPARKS. An explanation of the point of order?

Mr. KING. As a part of my remarks.

Mr. SPARKS. As a part of your remarks on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the memorial does not exactly relate to the point of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the question of whether his proposed amendment is germane to the bill and whether it retrenches expenditure.

Mr. KING. I cannot explain the nature of the amendment better than by having the memorial read.

Mr. SPARKS. Allow me to suggest that the gentleman does not need at this time to explain his amendment except to show that it is not subject to my point of order. I say that it is new legislation and increases rather than retrenches expenditures, and therefore it is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] that a point of order having been made upon his amendment it is not now in order to discuss the merits of the amendment; only the question as to whether the amendment is in order to the pending bill.

Mr. KING. I do not propose to discuss the merits of the amendment. I simply ask that the memorial be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the memorial is in the nature of debate, and that is not in order if objected to by any member.

Mr. HUBBELL. As my friend from Louisiana [Mr. KING] seems to want to do nothing but discuss the merits of his amendment, I ask that the Chair rule on the point of order, and then, if he rules that the amendment is germane and in order, the gentleman from Louisiana can have the memorial read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. KING. I will withdraw the amendment and the memorial, and ask that the memorial be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SPARKS. I do not object to that.

There being no objection, leave was granted accordingly.

The memorial was as follows:

Whereas we, the citizens of Natchez, Mississippi, and Concordia Parish, Louisiana, have met together for the purpose of taking such action as may be necessary to call the immediate attention of the Congress of the United States to the condition of the Mississippi River between the banks of Concordia Parish, Louisiana, and Adams County, Mississippi, to the danger of the river breaking into Lake Concordia and causing damaging changes to the river front of Natchez, and distress and probably ruin to a large number of the property-owners and laborers of Concordia Parish: Therefore, it is

Resolved, That the urgent attention of the Representatives in Congress from the sixth district of Mississippi and the fifth district of Louisiana be called to the subject-matter above alluded to, and that they be requested to urge at once the appointment by Congress of engineers to report immediately such relief as the exigencies of the case may demand, and that the said Representatives are requested and memorialized to promptly urge such legislation as may be necessary to afford full remedy and relief in the premises.

Resolved, That the chairman of this meeting appoint a committee of citizens of Natchez and Concordia Parish, in such number as he may deem necessary, to represent the full facts and history of the matter herein contained to our Representatives in Congress, and urge their immediate action in the premises.

Resolved, That the secretary of this meeting is hereby requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to the members of Congress herein mentioned.

Mr. KLOTZ. I offer as an additional amendment to section 10 that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the act of Congress approved March 9, 1878, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"An act amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and their widows, and the soldiers, sailors, and marines employed in the war with Mexico which commenced April 24, 1846, and their widows.

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the names of the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men, without regard to color, including militia and volunteers, of the military and naval service of the United States who served for fourteen days in the war with Great Britain of 1812 and were honorably discharged, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted and drafted men, and the officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines who actually served with the Army and the Navy employed in the war with Mexico for fourteen days between April 24, 1846, and July 4, 1848, and were honorably discharged, and the surviving widows of such officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines.

"SEC. 2. That this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension of less than $8 per month, except for the difference between the pension now received (if less than $8 per month) and $8 per month. Pensions under this act shall be at the rate of $8 per month, except as herein provided, and shall be paid to the persons entitled thereto, from and after the passage of this act, for and during their natural lives: Provided, That the pensions to widows provided for in this act shall cease when they shall marry again.

"SEC. 3. That before the name of any person shall be placed upon the pension-rolls under this act, proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, shall prescribe, that the applicant is entitled to a pension under this act; and any person who shall falsely take any oath required to be taken under the provisions of this act shall be guilty of perjury; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the rolls the name of any person, when it shall appear, by proof satisfactory to him, that such name was put on said rolls by or through false or fraudulent representations, or by mistake as to the right of such person to a pension under this act. The loss or lack of a certificate of discharge shall not deprive the applicant of the benefit of this act, but other proof of the service performed and of an honorable discharge, if satisfactory, shall be deemed sufficient; and when there is no record evidence of such service and such discharge, the applicant may establish the same by other satisfactory testimony: Provided, That when any person has been granted a land warrant under any act of Congress for and on account of service in the said wars of 1812, and 1846 with Mexico, such grant shall be prima facie evidence of his service and honorable discharge, so as to entitle him, if living, or his widow, if he be dead, to a pension under this act; but such evidence shall not be conclusive, and may be rebutted by evidence that such land warrant was improperly granted.

"SEC. 4. That all applications for pensions of the classes provided for in this act heretofore or which may hereafter be made shall be considered and decided as though made under this act; and all laws now in force in regard to the manner of paying pensions, and in reference to the punishment of frauds, shall be applicable to all claims under the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the names of all persons now surviving heretofore pensioned on account of service in the war of 1812 against Great Britain, or for service in any of the Indian wars, or for service in the aforesaid war with Mexico, and whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled 'An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels,' approved February 4, 1862, whose disabilities have been removed, or who have made application for such removal; and that the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression,' approved March 2, 1867, and section 4716 of the Revised Statutes at Large of the United States, shall not apply to the persons provided for by this act: Provided, That no money shall be paid to any one on account of pensions for the time during which his name remained stricken from the rolls.

"SEC. 6. That the surviving widow of any pensioner of the war of 1812, or the surviving widow of any pensioner of the war of 1846 with Mexico, where the name of said pensioner was stricken from the pension-rolls in pursuance of the act entitled 'An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government, or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels,' approved February 4, 1862, and where, under the existing provisions of law, said pensioner died without his name being restored to the rolls, shall be entitled to make claim for a pension as such widow after the passage of this act: Provided, That no such arrearages shall be paid for any period prior to the time of the removal of the disability of the pensioner, or the date at which application was made for removal, as provided in section 5.

"SEC. 7. That the provisions of sections 4745, 4746, 4747, 4748, 4766, 4768, 4769, 4785, and 4786 of the Revised Statutes of the United States are hereby made a part of this act so far as the same are applicable; and no law or laws now in force which in any way conflict with the provisions of this act shall be applicable to the survivors of the wars above mentioned, or be so construed as to deprive them of the benefits of this act: Provided, That no agent shall charge a fee greater than $10 to a claimant under this act.

"SEC. 8. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person while under the political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

"SEC. 9. That all laws and clauses of laws in conflict with this act be, and they are hereby, repealed."

Mr. BROWNE. I make the point of order on that amendment that it is not germane to the bill; that it is new legislation, and certainly is not in the interest of economy.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask the Chair to rule on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the point of order is well taken, and that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. MCCOOK. I move to strike out the whole section as amended.

Mr. CLYMER. Do I understand that the amendment of my colleague [Mr. KLOTZ] is ruled out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled out the amendment under Rule 120, which provides that no provision shall be in order as part of a regular appropriation bill except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KLOTZ] does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. MCCOOK. I move to strike out the whole section as amended, because it appears to me that the provisions of the Revised Statutes, with the regulations under them, are amply sufficient to settle this question of promotion in the Army. In addition to that, I desire, so far as I am personally concerned, to put on record my protest against any action or proposed action by this House or this Congress that will in any manner, directly or indirectly, interfere in any way with the Army of the United States. I can see no reason for this provision prohibiting the promotion of officers above the rank of captain. In reference to the officers of our Army it seems to me that their age, their services to the Republic, and the obligations that we assumed when we entered into the contract with them, which was certainly implied, if not express, require that so long as they are able to perform their duties the Government of the United States shall make proper provision for them. That obligation it seems to me is now in as full force as when originally assumed. I therefore hope—almost against hope, however—that this section will be stricken from the bill.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MCCOOK] seems to be always arrayed on the side of and to speak in the interest of the Army, and as its advocate he opposes this section. Now, I understand that perhaps a majority, certainly many of the Army officials, have recommended this precise legislation. My colleague on the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress, Mr. Hewitt, framed this section, having had frequent conferences upon the subject with officers and others connected with the Army. It was thought that some restriction should be put upon promotions and appointments.

Sir, we must remember that this small Army of ours of less than twenty-five thousand men, with perhaps not twenty-two thousand muskets in hand, is now costing this Government this year nearly $27,000,000, an extravagant sum for the force we have in the field; and this expense results quite largely from this matter of promotions and the superabundance of officers and Army officials, and all that sort of thing. It was felt that promotions should be restricted so as to relieve the country as much as we could of this extravagant burden upon it. With this object in view the pending section has been introduced into this bill. It proposes that there shall be no promotions or appointments above the rank of captain, except where captains have served for twenty years, this latter clause having been adopted as an amendment, on motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL,] lately a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and which amendment I heartily favored and proposed originally to put in the bill.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If the object of this provision is to reduce expenditures, why should there be promotions above the rank of captain and not below it?

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman has got "the cart before the horse." Under this section there can be promotions below the rank of captain, but not above it. This provision, as every gentleman who examines it will see, must necessarily save to the Treasury a very considerable sum of money, and at the same time I am authorized to say that the efficiency of the Army will not be impaired. When, therefore, in legislating for the Army and for the people we can preserve the efficiency of the Army and at the same time save to the people and relieve them of an onerous burden, and that, too, in an establishment for which the present expenditure is altogether extravagant, I believe it my duty as a member of Congress to pursue that line of policy. That is what we have attempted to do here in this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. It will be remembered, at least by members of the last Congress, that the Army appropriation bill passed by the House at the last session contained provisions for the reorganization of the Army; and those provisions would perhaps have been agreed to by the Senate but for other provisions which were regarded as objectionable. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] came to consult with members on this side as to the character of the Army appropriation bill which should be introduced at this session, it was thought proper that we should not prolong the sitting of Congress by thrusting at this time into this bill the question of reorganization. This provision was a part of that scheme of reorganization, and its simple purpose is to stay promotions until this matter can be considered hereafter.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. McCOOK,] who is an authority upon military matters, does not desire that there should be any change in the organization of the Army. On the other hand, gentlemen of great distinction, the highest officers in the Army, have thought it proper that there should be a reorganization. So far as my opinion is concerned, I think this proposed reorganization of little worth; but there are eminent men of all parties in and out of the Army who think it ought to be adopted. The purpose of this provision is that matters shall stand still, that promotions shall be staid until this question shall be considered.

Mr. CONGER. I adopt the reasoning of the gentleman who has just spoken. I think that until the proposed scheme for the reorganization of the Army shall have received the sanction of Congress it is better not to disturb the present status of the Army. Hence I believe it is not wise to adopt this section. Let the Army stand under the law as it is now. Do not by such an amendment as this provide that, until some new law is enacted, if the colonel of a regiment is killed in battle or otherwise dies there shall be no colonel of that regiment; if the lieutenant-colonel dies, there shall be no lieutenant-colonel; that no vacancies of this kind shall be filled, but inferior officers shall take places not prescribed by law. It is unfair to the officers, unfair to the regiments, unfair to the companies, unfair to the Army, unfair to the people of the country, to enact now a law declaring that there shall be no promotions, no appointments, according to the regular usage and forms of law, but that everything of this kind shall be held in abeyance until at some future time some law on the subject shall be enacted.

Mr. SPARKS. Does not the gentleman know that there are now many supernumerary officers, that there is a large surplus of officers?

Mr. CONGER. I do not know there is one colonel of a regiment in existence who has not a command; I do not know there is one lieutenant-colonel of all our regiments who has not a command, nor does the gentleman. It is not so. Every officer in the line, every officer of a regiment has his command, and this stops promotion. Now, if it be the object, if it be the design of gentlemen on that side of the House who fought these officers with all the bravery and all the desperation of their nature to punish them by refusing them the regular authorized lawful promotion in the Army to which they are entitled under the law, then let them say so boldly.

Mr. SPARKS. Is the gentleman alluding to me?

Mr. CONGER. I say if it is the object of gentlemen on that side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS. But I ask the gentleman whether he is alluding to me.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is on that side of the House and the gentleman claims to be a gentleman undoubtedly. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS. I was in the same category with the gentleman from Michigan, a little too cowardly to go in on either side. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman proposes to exhibit any evidence of his disgrace and shameful conduct to the country, why let him do so. [Laughter.] I served during the war continuously where my State appointed me, as a member of the State military board of Michigan. [Laughter on the democratic side.]

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman was on the civil list, as I understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. And I am proud to say that I organized, as one of that board, and clothed and armed and sent to the field the most effective enemies the gentleman ever met.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman wants my time. The gentleman having this bill in charge wants to take up my time.

Mr. SPARKS. No, sir; I want to ask you a question.

Mr. CONGER. He wants to take up the five minutes which I have to make a speech.

Mr. SPARKS. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CONGER. How great a fire a little "spark" kindleth. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS. Was the gentleman in the Army as a sutler or a chaplain? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. What, sir?

Mr. SPARKS. Were you a chaplain or a sutler? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. My peculiar organization and tendency would have naturally inclined me to be a chaplain, but I belonged to the militant part of the Army, the fighting part. [Laughter.]

I say again that I had the honor as a member of our State military board to organize, clothe, equip, and send down to meet the gentlemen of the South as valiant a set of men as ever went there. Michigan was on guard during the war and gentlemen know it.

Mr. SPARKS. But why did you not go?

Mr. CONGER. The Michigan troops captured even your civil leader, Jeff. Davis himself.

Mr. SPARKS. But was the gentleman one of them? That is the question.

Mr. CONGER. And that is the envy he has toward me, because I come from that State. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I withdraw the formal amendment.

Mr. McCOOK. I renew it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to my friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] for the undeserved compliment he paid me when he said I was authority on military matters. I disclaim any distinction of that character. I have the same knowledge of this bill gentlemen ordinarily have, and especially those who have been serving on the Committee on Military Affairs as I did in the previous House.

But I have a strong feeling of justice in regard to this matter. When the subject of the reorganization of the Army of the United States is brought into this House, presented in a separate and distinct bill, and urged upon the ground of economy, or any other proper ground, then I am ready to take my stand in regard to it, and possibly I may agree that the Army is, as some of our friends have said, a little top-heavy. I now object, however, in this manner to prohibiting the promotion of a certain class of officers above a specified rank. I assume from what I have seen that this section will interfere with the promotion of captains at the head of the list and field-officers up to the rank of colonel; the oldest officers in our service, many of whom have served in Indian wars, the war with Mexico, and during our "late unpleasantness;" most of them men of family and all of them, or a majority of them, graduates of the Military Academy of the United States. Certainly it appears to me, Mr. Chairman, there should be no distinction between the older officers of the Army and the younger officers, and for that reason, if I had none other, I make the motion to strike out the whole section.

Mr. CLYMER. I trust the motion of the gentleman from New York will not prevail. It is well known, not only to this House, but to the country, that there is an excessive number of officers, considering the number of men in our Army; and whenever we touch the subject of reorganization of the Army the chief difficulty is the disposition of this excessive number of officers.

Now, the intention of this section is to reduce the number of officers above a certain rank. Death, resignation, accident will do it; and if we cannot have a reorganization of the Army this year, if it fails as it failed in the last session, we will be lessening the obstacles to reorganization each year by adopting this section.

When this section was proposed as part of our legislation two years ago, it was done at the instance and with the approbation of nearly all the officers of the Army. Being themselves interested in its reorganization, in its permanency, and in its efficiency, they felt a clause of this kind would subserve those objects and in the end would render very easy that which is now so difficult and troublesome.

I think, after the amount of attention which was given to this subject in the last Congress and in the preceding Congress, it would be unwise for us at this hour, hastily, unadvisedly, without reason, and without mature thought, to alter the conclusions reached heretofore. Therefore I hope the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. McCOOK] will not prevail.

Mr. DIBRELL. I renew the amendment.

I desire to state that in the testimony taken by the Committee on Military Affairs of the last Congress it was shown by every officer who testified that a reorganization of the Army was necessary. It was shown that we had a large surplus of officers, three hundred and thirty-five or three hundred and forty according to the bill reported, and that it was necessary in reorganizing the Army to get rid of this large surplus. The promotions have generally been made in the staff. As evidence of that I may say that we have in the line not over sixty majors, while there are about one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty in the staff departments. The promotions have been disproportionate and all wrong; and the object of this amendment as originally introduced by Mr. Hewitt into the Army bill is to prevent the promotions till the reorganization is effected. I think, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from New York should not be adopted. Every officer of any prominence who testified was of opinion that this was absolutely necessary in order to the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. MARSH. I hope, Mr. Chairman, the motion of the gentleman from New York will prevail. Ever since the control of this House came into the hands of the democratic party there has been a continuous effort made to reduce or reorganize the Army. The last Congress remained in session for eleven months, and constant efforts were made by gentlemen on the other side to reorganize the Army of the United States, but they were unable during that whole period of time to bring before the American Congress a measure which would meet its approval.

It may be, Mr. Chairman, that a reorganization of the Army is necessary. I believe myself that a reorganization of the Army is necessary. But I contended during the Forty-fifth Congress, and I shall contend in this Congress, that a reorganization of the Army of the United States shall be made upon its own basis; that it shall be an independent measure; that it shall be discussed by the members of this Congress independently and disconnected from any other measure. And as I did in the Forty-fifth Congress I shall do now. I opposed, and shall oppose, by my vote and by my voice any attempt to cut down or disorganize the Army or to change the present law pertaining to it in the shape of an amendment to an appropriation bill. A matter of such great importance as this should have the attention of the proper committee. And it should have the attention of this House unobstructed and undistracted by other questions surrounding it.

I deny, Mr. Chairman, that it is fair to the Army or that it is fair to the country that there should be no promotions above the rank of captain. I say that it is mean, and contemptible on the part of the American Congress to undertake to cut down the strength of the Army by preventing officers, meritorious officers, from receiving that promotion which the law of the country entitles them to. If the gentlemen on the other side desire to cut down the number of officers above the rank of captain let them do so by a law; let them provide that there shall be no more than so many; let them cut down the number by act of Congress, and not undertake to do it by defrauding these captains and lieutenants from the just recognition of their services which the law of the country gives them.

Mr. Chairman, I hope that this section will be stricken out, not only because of what was embodied in it originally, but because of an amendment which has been adopted to it offered by my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. DIBRELL,] which provides that no officer shall be promoted except he shall have served for a period of twenty years in the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. SPARKS. I renew the formal amendment. This section was put in here, as I have before said, for the purpose of preventing promotions and appointments in the Army above a certain rank, with certain limitations, and the point aimed at by it was to economize in the public service and retrench expenditures. My colleague [Mr. MARSH] indicates a fear that we democrats are disposed in this bill to reinaugurate the attempt for a reorganization of the Army. If my colleague had simply read this bill he would have seen that we have rejected and specially kept out what was known as the reorganization feature of the bill of the Forty-fifth Congress; and I might remind my colleague, in passing, that reorganization did not come specially from us. That long-winded concern for reorganization which we had before us in the last Congress was known as the Burnside bill.

Mr. MARSH. The Burnside bill was not adopted; it was emasculated.

Mr. SPARKS. It was subsequently revamped and known as the Burnside-Banning-White bill; and I well remember that my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [General WHITE] was one of the most strenuous advocates in favor of its passage. Therefore do not charge us or credit us with being the late advocates of reorganization; neither the charge nor credit attaches to us alone.

But in this extra session, discarding that long fight, we concluded that we would let alone the reorganization feature of the bill and, as my colleague has urged, let it come from the Committee on Military Affairs at the regular session, as in fact it did come from that committee at the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress. But in the mean time it was believed that by stopping promotions above a certain rank and by preventing appointments of a certain rank until reorganization could be effected in the manner indicated, we could save to the country a good deal of money, and we wanted to do it, and in that I think we have acted wisely and well; but the gentleman from Illinois seems to think that we will not have anybody to fill the place of these colonels, &c., should any of them happen to die. I find from the Army Register, which I now hold in my hand, that we have sixty-seven colonels.

Mr. WHITE. How many regiments have you?

Mr. SPARKS. I believe twenty-five of infantry.

Mr. WHITE. We have twenty-five infantry, ten cavalry, and five artillery regiments.

Mr. SPARKS. That makes forty, does it not?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, forty.

Mr. SPARKS. And you have sixty-seven colonels on the Army Register here. Now, I apprehend if one of these gentlemen should unfortunately die the country could get along by putting one of these supernumerary gentlemen in his place. The gentleman says that we have not more than we need. Why this register shows that we have nearly twice as many as we have regiments for. Anybody who will take the pains to examine the Army Register will see that this provision will not affect the efficiency of the service, and it certainly is a fact that many thousands of dollars will be saved to the country by it. Is it not the duty of members of Congress to do that?

Mr. MARSH. How many of those colonels are on the retired list?

Mr. SPARKS. None of them.

Mr. MARSH. None of the sixty-seven?

Mr. SPARKS. No, sir; not one of these sixty-seven colonels is on the retired list.

Mr. WHITE. Since the gentleman who has this bill in charge has referred to the action of the last Congress and to some connection I had with the adoption of the reorganization scheme by the commission appointed by Congress, I desire to say just a word upon that subject.

Mr. SPARKS. I simply adverted to the fact that the gentleman was in favor of the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. WHITE. I was certainly in favor of the reorganization feature which the last Congress attached to the Army appropriation bill reported by Mr. Hewitt, of New York. I am in favor of it now. I think it is an act of friendship to the Army and an act of justice to the public interests.

It is very well known that these staff officers create a social sentiment in this city and around this Capitol that makes it almost impossible to effect any reorganization of the Army in the public interest and in the interest of the line of the Army itself. I am not now going to debate that question. It is passed and gone.

If the question of the reorganization of the Army were an original question before this body at this time, I would as earnestly support it now as I did then, if I were the only member on the floor who did so. But the practical question before the House is the motion of the gentleman from New York to strike out section 10.

I did not hear his remarks, but what he designs to accomplish is to strike out that provision which prohibits any further promotions or appointments among the commissioned officers of the Army. Now, if you could reorganize the Army, if there was some practical measure here or in contemplation for that purpose, I would favor the retaining of this section; but in view of the fact that there is no practical measure for the reorganization of the Army pending before Congress, I submit that it is unfair to a large class of meritorious officers in the American Army to place this continued inhibition against promotions here.

I hold in my hand the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army in the Forty-fifth Congress which authorized what is known as the military commission on reorganization. This was the provision in relation to promotion:

> And thereafter no promotion or appointment shall be made to fill any vacancy that may occur or be created therein until after such report shall have been made and acted upon by Congress.

That was the provision inserted in the appropriation bill which passed the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress and that stopped promotions until the last Congress could act upon the report of that commission. The report was made. I had the honor of offering an amendment containing the recommendations of that report and contained in the appropriation bill in the last Congress, but it did not pass and it is a dead letter now, and consequently in view of that fact I am opposed to retaining this provision which stops all promotions in the Army of the United States.

I desire to make one further remark. There is an exception made here in favor of the Engineer department. Now the Engineer department is composed of one hundred and seven officers in all, and that is a very small proportion to the other two thousand and fifty-seven officers of the United States Army. It is unfair to select one department of the Army and prohibit any promotions in the other departments of the Army.

I submit, then, that in view of these considerations it is unfair to the Army to prohibit the meritorious promotions of officers who rendered valuable service in the war against the rebellion and in other wars of this country. I know instances in which this will stop the promotion of officers who commanded corps in the Army of the Potomac, the grandest army that ever trod on this continent.

Mr. ATKINS. In regard to the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] to the last clause of this section, as showing a preference for the Engineer Corps, I will state that the object of it was, as I understood, rather to accommodate the Chief of Engineers, General Humphreys. I think he desires to retire from the service.

Mr. WHITE. It is quite likely that is so, but it is invidious to discuss that question now. There are three officers in the Corps of Engineers who commanded corps in the Army of the Potomac, and one who commanded at one time the Army of the Potomac itself. I do not want to stop his promotion, and therefore I want to strike out the whole of this section.

Mr. ATKINS. I misunderstood the gentleman; I thought he desired to strike out that portion of the section.

Mr. WHITE. Not at all. I want to strike out all of the section for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. SPARKS. Now let us have a vote.

The question was taken upon striking out section 10, as amended; and upon a division there were—ayes 94, noes 102.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. CONGER said: Let us have tellers on that question.

Tellers were ordered, there being 33 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of a quorum; and Mr. MCCOOK and Mr. SPARKS were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 97, noes 109.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I ask that the Clerk now read section 6, which was passed over informally yesterday.

The Clerk read section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States."

And that section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000 and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

Mr. CONGER. I raise the point of order against this section that both clauses of it involve new legislation, not germane to the bill and not in the interest of economy, for it does not upon its face or in any manner tend to retrench expenditures.

I will not stop to read now the sections of the Revised Statutes which it is proposed to amend. This section of the pending bill proposes the same amendment to both sections of the Revised Statutes. The only amendment proposed is at the end of section 2002 of the Revised Statutes to strike out the words "or to keep the peace at the polls;" and after the words "to repel armed enemies of the United States" in section 5528 of the Revised Statutes, to strike out the words "or to keep the peace at the polls." The sole amendment to the existing law proposed by both of these paragraphs involves new legislation. It proposes to change existing law by striking out the words in each section of the Revised Statutes referred to, "or to keep the peace at the polls."

Of course, in what I have to say upon the point of order, I do not wish at all to speak upon the merits of this sixth section. The Chair can see at once that it is new legislation; some think very essential new legislation; all think it is very essential new legislation. That it is in the interest of economy, that it is in any way possible to retrench expenditures by this section, no gentleman will affirm, and no gentleman could affirm it unless he had his thumb to his nose and his fingers extended. I do not wish to dwell upon this matter. In ordinary legislation in this House I apprehend there could not be any question upon the first presentation of this case. I apprehend there could not be a question in the mind of the member of the House least informed as to parliamentary law that this is new legislation, that it has no tendency to retrench expenditures, that it cannot come in under the rules of the House, that it is not even germane to any provision of this appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, there is no difference of opinion among members of this House that legislation upon an appropriation bill is undesirable. It is not contended by any that legislation should be fastened upon an appropriation bill except for some object outside of the ordinary course of legislation. Our rules permit it if it is germane to the subject of the bill. Our rules permit it only to meet that great serious demand of the country to retrench expenditures by legislation on all bills and on any bill wherever it can be done safely and with propriety. But that reason cannot in any manner apply to this case. It cannot be seriously pretended by any gentleman on this floor that striking out of the two sections of the Revised Statutes the words "to keep the peace at the polls" is in the interest of economy, that it is retrenchment of expenditures.

I do not propose, and, so far as I know, it is not proposed on this side of the House, to do any more than to submit this point of order to the Chair, and to say to the Chair that we confidently expect a ruling that this section is not in order according to the usual rules of the House and the decisions of the Committee of the Whole and of the Chair.

For myself I should have deemed it unnecessary to have said a word on this point of order. To my mind it is so clear and so apparent that I should have left it with the mere statement of the point of order. But the magnitude of it, and fearing that political or other views might be ascribed to us in making the point of order, might be ascribed to those who oppose the point of order, might even be ascribed to the occupant of the chair in his decision, make it perhaps important and proper that the proposition should be stated fairly; that we should present it to the consideration of the Chair as a point which we make seriously and in earnest, and, as I believe, with the full conviction on our part that this section is subject to the point of order. If that point of order shall be overruled, it will establish a precedent which will be exceedingly dangerous hereafter.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, this identical section was in the Army appropriation bill which passed this House at the last session. If any point of order was made upon it then, I am not aware of the fact; and I apprehend that if gentlemen had then, in the inception of the discussion upon the repeal of these provisions, felt that the proposition was subject to a point of order, that point of order would then have been raised.

Of course this provision repeals existing law; that is precisely what is designed by it—to repeal a portion of two sections of the statutes under which soldiers may now be used under military authority "to keep the peace at the polls." So far, then, as concerns the objection that this is new legislation repealing existing law, I frankly admit it.

Then the question arises, does it retrench expenditures? I can see wherein it does so most clearly. This bill in one of its sections appropriates $4,200,000 for the transportation of the Army. If, then, any part of the Army may be taken from the posts where our soldiers are now stationed and removed to and placed at the polls in the various election districts in the various States where elections are being held, to keep the sovereign citizens in order, will not that necessarily and certainly increase expenditures? And if we strike out the provision of law under which that may be done, do we not retrench such expenditures to the extent of the cost of the transportation of so much of the Army as may be thus taken from the posts where now stationed to the various polling places to which they are taken?

It does seem to me (and I do not wish to discuss this question at any length) that anybody must see at a glance that there must be a very large expense incurred in this way for transportation from the posts where stationed to the polling places, and this expense is wiped out by a repeal of the law. The amount of expense which may be thus incurred depends of course upon the extent to which the Army may be so used. I hope for the credit of our free institutions that such an un-American principle as that the sovereign citizen must be watched and guarded at the polls when exercising his highest sovereign prerogative by his own paid servants has not been acted upon largely in this country; and I hope it never will be.

Mr. CONGER. Cannot the gentleman withhold for a little while his remarks on the merits of the proposition?

Mr. SPARKS. I am now discussing the gentleman's point of order, and I repeat again that I hope the time will never come when there will be one dollar of the people's money expended for any such purpose. It has been stated that very little has been expended in that direction heretofore. I hope for the honor of my country that that is true. But, sir, by this provision we propose to say that no money shall ever be expended in that way or for that purpose, and thus settle and finally end it, once and forever!

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, the first point made by the gentleman in charge of this bill is that a provision similar to this was put upon the Army bill at the last session without objection. I do not understand that a fact of that kind would affect the question of the right to put it on the bill now when the point is raised; but at the same time I desire to say that when this provision came up at the last session the gentlemen who were in charge on this side of the House happened to be absent. As I happen to know, two of them were called out—why, I do not know, but they were called out—and in their absence this provision became a part of the bill, no one entering an objection or making a point of order. But there is no force at all in the conclusion the gentleman would draw from the fact that it was then admitted, because there was then no ruling at all upon the question of order.

I come now to the second point of the gentleman—that this provision upon its face shows retrenchment, because the use of the troops at the polls necessarily involves expense. Why, Mr. Chairman, this does not affect transportation. Under the Constitution of the United States the President of the United States is Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and can transport the troops wherever he pleases. There is no power in Congress to say to him that he shall transport the troops here and shall not transport them there. There is no spot of soil on this continent so sacred that the Commander-in-Chief of the Army cannot transport the Army to that spot.

Hence it seems to me too plain for argument that this amendment does not on its face show or indicate anything that will produce a reduction of expenditures; and I hold it to be the duty of the Chair to recognize that fact. Again and again to-day propositions which by argument, by logic, by proof might have been shown to retrench expenditures have been ruled out of order by the Chair because on their face they did not appear to retrench expenditures. Here is such a case exactly. On its face this provision merely strikes out from the existing law the words "to keep the peace at the polls." Now, where on the face of it does that involve a retrenchment of expenditures? Why, sir, the marshals and the deputy marshals have the right to-day to call for the assistance of the Army in preserving peace at the polls; when they are armed with warrants they have a right to call upon the Army of the United States to assist in enforcing such warrants. Suppose you provide here that these officers shall not have the power to call upon the Army to keep the peace at the polls, then you compel them, at the expense of the United States, to call upon men who are not under the pay of the United States by the score or by the hundreds, if you please, to preserve the peace, to enforce the law, to protect them in the performance of their duties; and thus you increase the expenditures, it may be to the extent of hundreds and thousands of dollars over what would be incurred if they were permitted to have the assistance of the Army of the United States.

I say, then, that by argument, by logic, by proof it can be shown that this provision increases expenditures. But I do not hold that the Chair has the right to entertain such an argument. I simply submit that if on putting the eye upon the proposition it does not on its face appear to reduce expenditures, and does at the same time change existing law, it is clearly not in order.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, this point of order is made under the latter clause of Rule 120, which is in these words:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill—

That is, a general appropriation bill—or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

The first question that arises is, are the clauses which are proposed to be repealed germane to the subject-matter of the bill? The very title of the bill brings up the question of the Army and its uses. This bill is a measure to enable the Government to avail itself of the use of the Army for the purposes prescribed by law. That being so, it is germane, I take it, to repeal a provision of law having relation to the use of a portion of that Army for which we are now appropriating. So, I take it, there can hardly be a question but these two sections are germane to the bill itself.

Now, as to whether they retrench expenditures. The laws upon the statute-book and the practice under them known to us all by use of the Army for the purpose of controlling elections, thereby incurring the expense of transportation from place to place and distribution to various portions of the country, must of necessity involve increased expenditure on the part of the Government. The reports of the proper Departments as to expenditures in the past show the nature, character, and extent of that expenditure. No one, in view of the existing law and the practice under it during past years, can doubt but that the repeal of the law, placing it beyond the power of those in command of the Army to use it for any such purpose as here indicated, would reduce expenditures. The law now authorizes the use of the Army in this sort of service, and that will continue unless the law is repealed. The practice, according to the reports of the War Department, has demonstrated such use results in increased expenditures. It would seem, therefore, that the repeal of the law allowing such use would retrench expenditures. Of that, I take it, there can be no doubt.

If those two points are covered, then this proposition to repeal the law is germane to the bill, and that repeal is justified by the fact that it is not only germane but will reduce expenditures by abridging the use of the Army, saving the necessity for its transportation from point to point for the purpose of keeping the peace at the polls, as it is called. That is the general name given to it, but it hardly indicates the use which has been made of the Army, or I should say the abuse of the Army. It has been used to dismiss Legislatures, to set up Legislatures, to change State governments, to abolish those in existence and usurp their places by others. It is this abuse of the Army for political purposes. It is this abuse of the Army not only for the purpose of controlling elections, but in determining who was and who was not elected. It is clear to my mind from these references that the point of order is not well taken, and that the sections should remain in the bill, as they are not only germane but do retrench expenditures.

Mr. ROBINSON. Some allusion, Mr. Chairman, has been made by the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that no action in the form of a point of order was taken at the last session to this same amendment when proposed. As I have a very clear recollection of the circumstances at the time the amendment was offered, I propose to state them in this connection.

It will be remembered that the gentleman from New York, Mr. Hewitt, had charge of the Army bill, and on its first consideration made a long speech in the House on the subject. He then cited the statutes we have now under consideration, and said he intended to offer an amendment, just the same in terms as we have here to-day to which the point of order is made. At that time, at the very outset, Mr. Hewitt said that it was subject to the point of order, but he hoped no gentleman on either side would make it and that the House might be allowed to vote on the proposition. I not only have it clearly in my mind as a recollection but I have it before me, and I ask the Clerk to read it in order that there may be no mistake.

I ask that he first read the law which Mr. Hewitt cited, and then that portion of the remarks I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Now, I count upon the cordial support of both sides of this House in the attempt to amend the statute which I have just read, by striking out the words "or to keep the peace at the polls." At the proper time I shall offer an amendment for that purpose. This provision is not now in the bill as reported to the House, because I think it better that there should be a direct vote of the House taken as to whether it shall come in or not.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman proposes to move that as an amendment to the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, of course, subject to a point of order, which I trust no gentleman will make. I count, indeed, upon the unanimous support of both sides of the House of such an amendment. I know that on this side of the House we do not monopolize either the statesmanship or the patriotism of this country. I accord to gentlemen on the other side the fullest credit for a desire to preserve whatever we have gained in the direction of freedom, and to add to it by every possible means.

Mr. ROBINSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be observed plainly that the section which the Clerk read at the request of Mr. Hewitt at that time was the first section alluded to in the proposed amendment, and is not the section referring to the repeal of the penal statute.

I want that made clear because there may be some discussion upon that point. In the next place, it is true that Mr. Hewitt's language is "subject to a point of order," and the argument may be made that he only said the point of order might be raised by some gentleman, but would not be sustained. But I beg gentlemen to go forward and see what Mr. Hewitt said:

Which I trust no gentleman will make.

What does that mean? According to all the rules of language and common sense taught among men, he knew fully the point of order would lie and the Chair would sustain it.

Subject to a point of order, which I trust no gentleman will make.

I cite this because the gentleman from Illinois said that the gentlemen on the republican side made no objection at the last session and did not raise the point of order. Why, sir, it was laid down in the face of the House there was a point of order on which this could be ruled out. I only answer that objection which was made by the gentleman from Illinois because the circumstances were fresh in my mind; and I remember very well that the gentleman from Maine, Mr. Hale, who raised the question at the time the discussion went on, was absent from his seat when the amendment was offered, and so failed to make the point of order.

I sat here very patiently in the last Congress listening to the discussion of points of order under Rule 120, to find out what amendments should go in and what should remain out. If there is any standing and clear rule that guides the Chair, I have yet to find it. "That shall retrench expenditures," says the rule; and the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the chair said, only yesterday, new legislation to be in order shall appear on its face to retrench expenditures. That was the language of the Chair yesterday. I hope we shall not have anything different in the ruling upon this section to-day. I say it is of the utmost importance that we hold to this rule strictly. It is of importance to both sides of this House that it should not be so construed as to let some pet project come in to-day which ought not to come in, because, as gentlemen have said, curses will come home to roost by and by, and our books are filled up with precedents that will be no guide to anybody in the future.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, upon the second point, that this proposed amendment does not retrench expenditures in terms. The amendment is to strike out from the law the words, "or to keep the peace at the polls." It is not an affirmative amendment directing the Army to be used for a certain purpose which would require expense; not at all. It is simply a negative. It is prohibitory. It does not belong to new legislation which curtails expenditure. It seems to me that distinction should be very clearly kept in mind. It does not appear that a dollar will be saved the Treasury of the United States by striking out these few words from the statute; not at all. The President, under the Constitution, is compelled to send the Army where it shall be called for—even, I maintain, to keep peace at the polls. I am not discussing the merits of the question, but under the Constitution the President is required to send troops on the call of the executive or the legislature, as the case may be. That being the case, he must obey the Constitution, and this change in the statutes cannot, when the President is called upon to send troops, save one dollar to the Treasury; and, therefore, this amendment does not retrench expenditure.

Mr. SPARKS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question. Is the use of the Army an expense to the Government?

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman asks a question which he is quite competent to answer himself. Ask me a harder one.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman, of course, admits that the use of the Army is an expense to the Government. If, therefore, you reduce the uses to which it is applied, do you not necessarily retrench expenditure?

Several MEMBERS. No, no!

Mr. HUMPHREY. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] a question.

Mr. ROBINSON. I want to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPARKS. The troops can be used now to keep the peace at the polls. If you strike that out, will not the expense be diminished?

Mr. CASWELL. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois, does it not retrench expenditures to keep the peace?

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from Illinois asks me whether this section does not restrict the use of the Army, and whether, therefore, it does not save money? I go deeper than that question goes. You cannot take away the President's power to send the Army to put down domestic violence at the polls; and if you cannot take away that power you cannot save a dollar.

Mr. SPARKS. Can we not repeal this statute and say that the Army shall not be used "to keep the peace at the polls?"

Mr. ROBINSON. What I say is this, if Congress says what the Constitution does not allow it to say it has not curtailed the power of the President or saved a dollar.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman does not answer my question, but evades it.

Mr. MCLANE. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] on the other side of the House claimed the President of the United States had the power to send the Army where he pleased without the control of Congress; and, therefore, it is not possible for this House or for this Congress, the law-making power, to economize the public money by controlling the use of the Army. Sir, I do not believe that position has ever been taken before in either House of Congress, that the President of the United States cannot be controlled by the law-making power in the use of the Army. Yet that was the position of the gentleman from Maine. Why, sir, the power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army and Navy is a fundamental power in this Government. It is one of the express powers granted in the Constitution, and I never heard anywhere in this country a question made that we had a right to control the Executive in the use of the Army.

Mr. HASKELL. Will the gentleman from Maryland allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HASKELL. Have you read section 4, article 4, of the Constitution of the United States, which says that—

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence?

Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Maryland if, in the great State of New York a state of domestic violence existed, in the center of which was located the polls where the officers of the United States were to be elected, on application of the governor of that State, under this Constitution, the President would not be empowered in spite of Congress to send troops to the aid of the executive in that place?

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman's inquiry is not at all pertinent to the point at issue, if he will allow me to tell him so; and if he will think about the matter at all, he would be satisfied of the fact himself.

I am dealing with the general power of the President to send the Army where he pleases. Of course, where the President orders the Army to go under the express provision of the Constitution, as in the case presented by the gentleman, that has no reference to the general power to order the Army from east to west and from north to south.

Mr. HASKELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. McLANE. I will, if it be pertinent to the subject I am discussing.

Mr. HASKELL. It is. Under the operation of this law do you pretend to say that under no circumstances shall any armed body of troops be sent to the polls? I ask you if, in spite of that law, the governor of the State of New York on election day in that State finds a condition of domestic violence existing, and asks the President of the United States that troops shall be given him right there at the polls, they would not under the Constitution have to go there?

Mr. McLANE. I say to the gentleman from Kansas, that whenever the governor of a State, the Legislature of the State not being in session and he not having it in his power to get them in session, certifies to the President that he cannot suppress the insurrection, the President is bound by the Constitution to send the Army and suppress that insurrection.

Mr. HASKELL. In spite of this law?

Mr. McLANE. No law of Congress can curtail that power.

Mr. HASKELL. That is enough.

Mr. McMAHON. Will the gentleman from Maryland allow me to call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to the law as we propose to allow it to stand? It reads: "If it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States." [Cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" on the republican side of the House.] I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas, when do persons become armed enemies of the United States?

Mr. HASKELL. Judging from the remarks which I have heard made on one side or the other in the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, and Forty-sixth Congresses, I declare before my Maker that I do not know what the other side of the House would consider to be armed enemies of the Government. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McMAHON. I call attention to the fact that armed enemies of the United States may exist within its borders, and we have reserved the right of the President to use the troops whenever that is the case.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Chairman, I did not mean to depart from the point of order which is being discussed, and I shall not be led by the inquiries of the gentleman from Kansas into any discussion not strictly pertinent to the point of order. The point of order is, that this section is not germane to the bill because it does not retrench expenditures.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] made the point, that it would not retrench expenditures, because it could not control the President in moving troops where he pleased, and thus there would be no economy in the cost of transportation. In reply to that argument I submit to his candor, whether it is not in the power of Congress to make rules and regulations for the government of the Army and Navy, and in those rules and regulations to control the President in his direction of the Army and Navy? I want an answer to that question.

Mr. FRYE. I want the gentleman to understand me perfectly. Here is a proposition that the Army should not be used at the polls to keep the peace. My point is this: that you may enact it into a law, but you will not affect the power of the President to transport the troops from one State to another as he pleases. If he as Commander-in-Chief wishes to supply a fort in the State of Maine with men he can do so in spite of an act of Congress.

Mr. McLANE. That is not an answer; no qualification of the gentleman's remark.

Mr. FRYE. It is precisely the remark I made, that this legislation of Congress would not tend to promote economy in expenditures, because it still leaves in the power of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army the right to transport the Army to such points as he thinks it most needed.

Mr. McLANE. I insist that the gentleman from Maine shall make a distinction between the general power to move the Army from Maine to Texas and the particular power to move it from one point in a State to another point in the same State on the day of election.

He knows very well that the Army cannot be moved without some expenditure of money, and he knows very well that the Army barracks, or a station of the Army, is not the polls at which the election is held.

It is not a question of amount of expenditures. The issue between the gentleman from Maine and this committee is that you cannot retrench expenditures one dollar by this provision. The observation that the President can move the Army where he pleases in this country is not at all pertinent to that issue. Our question is, can he be restrained by law? Can the Congress of the United States, which is authorized by the Constitution to enact rules and regulations for the government of the Army, stipulate in those rules and those regulations that the President shall not order any portion of the Army from their barracks to the polls?

Now, I am very free to admit that I do not suppose that there is any question on either side of the House that this point of order is a very significant point in this discussion. The gentleman on my right who last addressed the committee, [Mr. ROBINSON,] when he referred to the fact that the decisions were not very uniform on this point, might well have stated that they were very elastic. He might well have said that in the history of legislation in this country there is no subject-matter of legislation that has not found its way into appropriation bills.

And it is not worthy of the attention it has received as to whether this particular provision is in order or not. It has been decided by precedents to be in order. It was put into this bill in the last Congress, and we to-day are dealing with it precisely as we found it incorporated into this bill by a previous Congress. There is no more departure from the practice of the House than from the general rules of the House.

The gentleman from Illinois who has charge of this bill [Mr. SPARKS] has stated specifically that this provision will result in a reduction of expenditure. How much or how little is not at all material to the question. In reply to that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] entirely evaded the issue when he spoke of the right of the President to control the Army. We are referring to his right to make a particular movement of the Army. We are referring to the right of Congress to make rules and regulations for the Army. That has no reference whatever to some other obligation fixed in the Constitution, such as that to which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] has referred.

I will not go into the general question, although I might very well do it, and it might be very well for me to try to do it. But we will have an opportunity later, and I am very sure that I will find the main question itself very well treated by other members on the floor.

My object has been to sustain the gentleman in charge of this bill in his position upon the point of order, in his specific allegation that this section will retrench expenditures; how much or how little I care not. That position has been assailed in a manner unworthy really of the gentleman who made the assault, whose intelligence and whose astuteness, although I have not had the honor to sit with him in any former Congress, I know very well by general repute. I know there are none better qualified to deal with this question than he, and I am somewhat surprised to find him evading the issue in his argument sustaining the point of order.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. SPARKS] to say in discussing this point of order that we are now engaged simply in an effort to repeal a law, and as that was all the work we were now engaged in, and as it related to the use of the Army, it was therefore germane to this bill to attach to it the class of legislation contained in section 6 of the bill. He also stated that it might be or was in the interest of economy to repeal the sections of our statutes relating to the use of the Army at the polls.

I also understood the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to state that because the bill under consideration related to the Army we had a particular right to legislate upon it in any way we choose on any matter that appertained to the Army, and that it would be germane to the bill to put on any such legislation. Now, I think both of those gentlemen have spoken inconsiderately and inadvertently, and that neither of them will upon due reflection undertake to stand upon their statements.

In the first place, this is not a work of repeal which we are engaged in. It is a work of making that which was hitherto a duty, made so by law, a crime; a crime entirely new, wholly new, in connection with officers of the Army and officers of the Navy and the civil officers of this Government. Never before, I believe, in the history of this country has it been attempted to make it a crime for an officer of the Army or an officer of the Navy, or a marshal of the United States, or a deputy marshal of the United States, to keep the peace. This proposed legislation is intended to do that. Then I say to the gentleman from Texas, this is not legislation that pertains to the Army alone. It undertakes to make it a high crime, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any civil officer of the United States to appear on election day at the polls with an armed body of men, not troops, not United States soldiers, but to go with an armed body of men to the polls to quell a riot. That will be the express effect of this proposed legislation.

It does not change the old section altogether, but it re-enacts the section in such form as to make for the first time a civil officer guilty of a crime if he carries out existing law. Under the present law, by the statutes of the United States and at common law, it is made the imperative duty of marshals, deputy marshals, and all the constabulary force of the United States to put down riots and to suppress all kinds of disorder everywhere in the United States within their respective districts when such riots and disorders come under their observation and personal notice. This legislation undertakes to make it a crime for those officers to do this if they go with armed men to do it—not soldiers but armed men. They may go with feathers in their hands without violating the law; but when armed force is to be resisted, when it becomes necessary to quell rioters with arms in their hands, persons gathered together for the purpose of murder, intimidation, or whatever else it may be, the marshals and their deputies, whose duty it is now by law to quell such disturbances and restore and preserve peace, must go without any armed men with them; otherwise under this proposed legislation they will be guilty of a high crime.

Mr. KNOTT. Will my friend allow me to call his attention to section 5528?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes, sir; that is one of the sections we are now dealing with, in which we propose to strike out the words "to keep the peace at the polls." That is all we propose to do, so as to make the penalties provided by these sections when re-enacted apply first to military officers, second to naval officers, third to civil officers of the United States when they come with troops or armed men to suppress a riot or any other kind of disorderly and illegal organization of men at the polls. Now, when the marshal or deputy marshal comes, as it is his duty to come, to quell a riot, he has the right to summon the law-abiding citizens of the community to obey his orders, to go if you please armed—to become his posse comitatus in quelling such disturbances. But this proposed legislation takes away from the marshals and other civil officers of the United States who are charged with similar duties the power of putting down a riot on election day at the polls and makes it a high crime punishable by fine and imprisonment if such an officer undertakes to do it. This does not relate to the Army and Navy alone, but to the civil side of the Government. This is the work we are engaged in.

Hence, I insist that this proposed legislation is not germane to the Army appropriation bill. It is not germane because it affects officers of the Navy; and this is not a naval bill. It is not germane because it affects civil officers of the Government. It is not germane in any sense. If the legislation proposed as a whole includes anything not within the rule it must all fall together.

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman speaks of this being a new crime. Will he tell me when it was first allowed by law that the Army should be used at the polls to keep the peace?

Mr. KEIFER. When the Government was organized, when we first had an army of the United States, it became the duty of that army under certain circumstances to quell riots, to put down men engaged in any sort of disorderly conduct, whether at the polls or at church or wherever else in the country; and this has always been the law up to the present hour.

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman will permit me to correct him.

Mr. KEIFER. I will not permit the gentleman to make a speech in the middle of mine; I will permit him to put a question.

Mr. CHALMERS. Then I ask the gentleman whether he does not know that this law was enacted in 1865 for the first time?

Mr. KEIFER. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman entirely misunderstands the legislation on this subject, although he is a very excellent lawyer. For the first time, in 1865, there was enacted a statute making it a crime for any officer of the Army or the Navy or any civil officer of the Government to interfere on election day for any purpose except in repelling the armed enemies of the United States or in keeping the peace.

Mr. CHALMERS. Exactly.

Mr. KEIFER. But from the beginning of the Government to the present hour it has always been the right and the duty of the officers of the Army and the Navy, as well as certain civil officers of the United States, to keep the peace everywhere.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman will allow me to ask him whether there is any statute to that effect enacted prior to 1865, and if so, where is it?

Mr. KEIFER. If I understand the gentleman——

Mr. CARLISLE. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether this debate is proceeding under the five-minute rule or not?

Mr. KEIFER. We are under no five-minute rule. Now, I desire to answer the very pertinent inquiry——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] has stated a question of order which the Chair did not hear. He will please state it again.

Mr. CARLISLE. I simply put the inquiry whether this debate is proceeding under the five-minute rule. If it is, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has largely exceeded his time. I am not insisting upon the enforcement of the rule, but merely desire to know what the rule is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that all debate on the point of order is under the control of the committee itself, and as no objection has been raised it is proceeding by common consent.

Mr. CARLISLE. Then I do not object.

Mr. KEIFER. I would have been through some time ago but for the pertinent inquiries made on the other side.

The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPARKS,] as I understood him, asked whether prior to the act of February 25, 1865, there was any law on the subject of the use of troops at the polls. That is the way I understood him. Now let me say to him and to other members, that was the first time in the history of the country, so far as I know, that there was any restraining statute upon our statute-books at all in relation to the use of troops at the polls or anywhere else in the United States, and that legislation prohibited the use of troops and armed men at the polls by military, naval, or civil officers in the service of the Government, except for the purpose of repelling armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls. Those two cases were excepted in this legislation passed by a republican Congress, and we propose that this legislation shall remain as it now is, so that it shall not be said as a reproach and a stigma upon this country that we have officers, military, naval, and civil, whose duty it is by law, under penalties to keep the peace everywhere, save and except on one day at least in each year these officers shall be required to fold their arms and look on and witness riot, murder, intimidation, or anything else of an unlawful character, going on before their eyes, or be subject to severe penalties.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I understand the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] to say that he did not agree with my friend on the right [Mr. FRYE] in his statement in regard to the power and duty of the President of the United States in relation to the movement of troops. I understood him to state as a reason why he did not concur in my friend's statement, that we had the power to regulate the President of the United States in his government of the Army. I understood the logic of that to be that it is the duty of Congress, and its right whenever we have a war, or that which is akin to it, insurrection, riots, or domestic violence, or whatever else arises in the country to put down which the Army is required—that it is the right and the duty of Congress, in the first instance, as each impending battle or engagement comes on, to meet in debate and consider just how the President shall order his troops to go into battle. I understood that to be the entire logic of the gentleman's position. He believes that the President must withhold his orders and act as the mere mouth-piece of Congress. In his view the President of the United States must wait until Congress has said "Move your troops to the right or the left; charge upon the right, or the left, or the center, and so on." I do not understand that to be any part of the duty of Congress; and let me say I think perhaps it is the first time it was ever stated upon the floor of Congress that Congress had any such extraordinary right. The Constitution gives to the President as commander-in-chief the absolute right and the power to move the Army or Navy when raised as he pleases, when an emergency has arisen or war has been declared. By the second section of the second article of the Constitution of the United States the President is made the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States; and together with other powers given to him he has the right to move the Army whenever and wherever it is necessary to move it. The President is by the Constitution clothed with all the powers incident to a commander-in-chief, and such power cannot be taken away by law. We may pass laws for the government of the Army, but not to restrict and restrain the President's constitutional power so he cannot use it effectually and efficiently in time of war or any other time when it is necessary to call that strong arm of the Government into requisition.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate in this discussion, but some propositions have been stated here which it seems to me ought not to be permitted to go to the country unchallenged. I think this House and the country will hesitate a long time before accepting the doctrine announced by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief of the Army can transport troops wherever he pleases and use them for any purpose he sees fit with or without the consent of Congress. It is the first time I have ever heard that doctrine or anything akin to it announced by a gentleman of the respectability, intelligence, and standing of the gentleman from Maine. It is well known, sir, that although the King of Great Britain can raise armies without authority of Parliament, yet for more than two hundred years that body, representing the Lords and Commons of England, have controlled him in the use of those armies. In this country the President cannot enlist, arm, equip, or use a solitary soldier without the consent of Congress, without the consent of the Representatives of the people, and yet it is said that under the Constitution of the United States he possesses powers far more extensive and far more dangerous to the liberties of the people than a sovereign of Great Britain.

I undertake to affirm, and I do it deliberately, that under the Constitution of the United States the President has no right to use the Army or Navy, or any part of the Army or Navy, to protect the States against domestic violence or to enforce State laws unless he is authorized so to do by act of Congress. I will read to the House that provision of the Constitution which has been already read by my friend from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL:]

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

I appeal to my friends on the other side to tell me and the country whether they mean to say that this provision which it simply makes the duty of the United States to guarantee to each State a republican form of government and to protect it, upon the application of the governor or the Legislature, against domestic violence, confers upon the President, a single officer of the United States, any such power. Are the gentlemen prepared to go before the country on the proposition that the President is the United States?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. CONGER. To whom does the application come which is referred to?

Mr. CARLISLE. I will show the gentleman how it comes and why it comes.

Mr. CONGER. To whom does it come?

Mr. CARLISLE. It comes to the President. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed with my remarks I will answer his question, I hope, to the gentleman's entire satisfaction. That is the constitutional provision making it the duty, not of the President, but of the United States as a government to protect the States against domestic violence on the application of the governor or the Legislature. And I repeat the proposition that under that provision of the Constitution the President, without legislation on the part of Congress, did not possess one particle of power to use the Army or the Navy for this purpose. And the same authority which conferred the power on him by legislation can take it away from him. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. WHITE rose.

Mr. CARLISLE. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman not answer me a question which will not occupy more than a moment?

Mr. CARLISLE. I will.

Mr. WHITE. Does my friend remember that in Mr. Pierce's administration, on the 12th of June, 1856, the Secretary of the Navy, under the order of the President of the United States, at the request of the mayor, sent a body of marines to the fourth ward in this city while an election for municipal officers was going on, and they shot down unoffending American citizens? That act was sustained by the gentleman's political friends. Does he know that?

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman proposed to ask me a question. I have not yielded to allow him to inject a speech into the body of my remarks. I will answer the gentleman's question. I do remember at that election the soldiers of the United States or the marines were used in this city, a district under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and that my friend's political party complained loudly and long of it.

Mr. WHITE. Did not Henry C. Burnett, a predecessor of the gentleman from Kentucky, defend on this floor the use of the troops to keep peace at the polls?

Mr. CARLISLE. The District of Columbia was not in a State.

Mr. WHITE. Had not the District of Columbia a municipal city government, a mayor and police? [Laughter on the democratic side.]

Mr. CARLISLE. I cannot yield to the gentleman further.

Mr. WHITE. The District of Columbia had a municipal government, a mayor and police.

Mr. CARLISLE. Have I the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has the floor and declines to yield.

Mr. CARLISLE. I have asserted before that the authority of the President of the United States to use the Army or the Navy in protecting the States against domestic violence, or in assisting the States to enforce their laws, is derived not from the provision of the Constitution which I have read, but from an act of Congress passed February 27, 1795; and it is under that act that the President proceeds in every instance to send the Army or the Navy into a State to protect it against domestic violence or to enforce its State laws. The act is here before me, passed by the men who framed this Constitution and who knew what it meant. It was passed in 1795 and amended in 1807, and I will read the section as it now stands with the amendment incorporated into it:

In case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States, which may be applied for, as he deems sufficient to suppress such insurrection; or, on like application, to employ, for the same purposes, such part of the land or naval forces of the United States as he deems necessary.

There is the foundation and the only foundation upon which rests to-day all the authority the President has to use the troops, the Army or the Navy, for these purposes. And I submit to my friends on the other side if it is not entirely competent for the power which conferred this authority to take it away, to modify it, or to alter it. But I deny, sir, that under this authority, if left without any modification, the President can send soldiers into the States of this Union to stand around the polls on election day for the purpose of keeping the peace. I deny what has been asserted by my friend from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] that the United States deputy marshals can call upon the Army of the United States to assist them in keeping the peace. Up to the passage of the Army appropriation bill in the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress that was true; but in that bill there was inserted a clause which provided that the Army should not be used thereafter as a posse comitatus.

Mr. KNOTT. Will my colleague allow me to correct him? I think he is mistaken upon that point.

Mr. CARLISLE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KNOTT. Even prior to the amendment to the last Army appropriation bill there was no such authority as is claimed for marshals or deputy marshals to call upon the Army. Here is the provision of the law:

The marshals and their deputies shall have, in each State, the same powers, in executing the laws of the United States, as the sheriffs and their deputies in such State may have, by law, in executing the laws thereof.

Mr. CARLISLE. But we know that the United States Attorney-General during the administration of President Grant issued a circular of instructions to the marshals throughout the country in which he informed them that under what are known as the enforcement acts they had a right to call not only upon the citizens and the military forces and officers of the States, from the governor down, but on the Army and Navy of the United States, to come to their assistance as a posse comitatus to assist them in keeping the peace at the polls.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. CARLISLE. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] know—and I ask through the gentleman from Kentucky who has the floor the other gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT]—that Mr. Cushing as Attorney-General of the United States gave an opinion that the marshals and deputy marshals could call on United States soldiers as a posse comitatus?

Mr. CARLISLE. I believe he did.

Mr. FRYE. Now, if you will pardon me a moment longer, I desire to make one correction. The gentleman in commencing his speech stated that it was claimed by me that the President of the United States had the power to transport troops wherever he pleased for any purpose whatever. I did not say so. I never claimed that, but I claimed—and I think the gentleman will admit it—that if the words "to keep the peace at the polls" were stricken out it would not be any restriction whatever upon the power of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army to transport troops from barrack to barrack, and from State to State, as he saw fit. That was all I claimed. Does not the gentleman agree to that?

Mr. CARLISLE. Oh, certainly I do.

Mr. FRYE. I made that argument to show that this amendment did not on its face decrease expenditures.

Mr. CARLISLE. But if the President of the United States desires to transport the troops, not only from post to post within the States or Territories, but desires to distribute them at all the voting places in the States, will not the cost of transportation be largely increased?

Mr. FRYE. Not necessarily, [laughter,] because he might desire to transport the whole Army of the United States to the borders of Texas, or he might wish to put half a dozen soldiers at the polls in another State.

Mr. CARLISLE. Now, if I may be allowed to say a word in continuation and conclusion of my argument on the constitutional question as to the power of the President over the Army, I simply say, that when the Constitution provides that it shall be the duty of the United States to guarantee to each State a republican form of government and protect it against domestic violence, and so forth, it also conferred upon Congress by express provision the power to pass all laws necessary and proper to execute the powers conferred upon Congress itself or upon any department or officer of the Government. In the exercise of that power Congress passed the act of 1795 and the amendatory act of 1807, under which this constitutional provision is to be executed by the President alone. That authority is to be exercised under the conditions and qualifications prescribed in the act, and according to the methods defined by the act itself, and in no other manner.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARLISLE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, for whose legal ability and fairness of judgment I have great respect, whether he thinks that under the Constitution, expressing as it does the power of the United States to aid the States on the call of the executive under certain conditions, to suppress domestic violence, and the Congress of the United States having passed a law to put that part of the Constitution into effect—I would like to ask him whether this proposed amendment would repeal that law and restrict the power of the President?

Mr. CARLISLE. I do not, because I do not think that the law, as I have already stated, authorizes the President of the United States to use the troops at the polls to keep the peace. I believe the whole effect of that law is to do just what it provides: to authorize the President to send troops into a State to protect it against domestic violence upon the application of the governor or the Legislature of the State and not to send them into the State to stand at the ballot-box.

Mr. ROBESON. Exactly. I merely wished to ask the gentleman a question in order that I and the House might understand him. I am not arguing the question whether it is right or wrong to send troops to the polls to arrest voters, but we are merely discussing a question of order now, and I wish to ask the gentleman whether if the executive of a State, when the Legislature cannot be convened, or the Legislature itself, calls upon the President of the United States under the Constitution as it is written and under the law as it now stands to suppress domestic violence, and that domestic violence be at a place where a general election is taking place, the President of the United States is not bound under his oath of office to comply with the request? And, if so, whether this amendment is not in derogation of his constitutional power and duty?

Mr. CARLISLE. If the application is made in the regular form under the act of Congress I admit that it is the duty of the President to send troops, but I say that when troops have gone into a State and have dispersed the mob or the insurrectionists or whoever else is acting in resistance to the State authorities, they have performed their duty and must stop; they cannot remain at the election precincts to keep the peace, or, in other words, to prevent outbreaks of violence.

Mr. ROBESON. I am not now disputing that point. The gentleman having answered that question so fairly, I now ask him whether or not this section of this bill, this proposed amendment of the law, would take away the power of the President to do that thing, if properly called upon?

Mr. CARLISLE. It certainly will not, as I have stated again and again.

Mr. ROBESON. Now another question, if the gentleman will permit me. I do not desire to make a speech, but simply to ask a question.

Mr. CARLISLE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. If that be so, if this section does not take away his power in that respect, and if that contingency should happen, as it possibly may, then I would ask this question: is an officer of the Army of the United States, who is sworn to obey the lawful orders of the President of the United States, bound to obey should he be ordered by the President to suppress a riot and to quiet domestic violence at a place where a general election is being held? And if he does, what is to happen to him?

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] is asking me a question upon one subject and I am discussing another. [Laughter.] The gentleman from New Jersey asks me what would be the result in case an officer of the United States failed to perform his duty, where the President in giving him his order was acting in strict conformity to the law. I say that the officer is, of course, bound to obey the order.

We, however, are now discussing the question as to whether or not these soldiers shall be sent to a State for the purpose of keeping the peace at the polls, not for the purpose of suppressing domestic insurrection against the authority of the State or protecting the State against domestic violence. The two propositions are altogether different in their nature; they stand upon altogether different foundations. One is essential to the preservation, not only of the peace and integrity, but of the very existence of the Federal Government itself, because that Government cannot exist for a moment if the States are destroyed.

Mr. ROBESON. The amendment in effect says these troops shall not be there for any purpose. But one further question. Does the gentleman understand that the President of the United States is included in the scope of this section? In the fourth line of this section I find these words: "Other persons engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States." I would like to ask the gentleman whether he considers that that expression—because we want to understand the scope, force, and effect of this provision; that is all—whether he understands that that includes the President of the United States? And if it does, whether the President of the United States when called upon by the executive of a State in a proper manner—I assume all that—whether he would be liable to punishment under the provisions of this section if he acted upon that call of a State executive?

Mr. CARLISLE. My first answer to the gentleman's question is this: that the President cannot be properly called upon to do a thing which he has no power to do. In other words, he cannot be properly called upon to send troops into a State to preserve peace at an election.

Mr. ROBESON. But I understood the gentleman to say that he thought this section did not affect that power of the executive of a State to call upon the President, nor the duty of the President to respond to that call. If that be so, then he would be properly called upon and not improperly; and the troops would be there under his order.

Mr. CARLISLE. In further answer to the questions put by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] I desire to say that the words of this section to which he has called my attention are taken from the act of February 25, 1865; it is an exact copy of that act so far as those words are concerned. I do not know what construction the Administration then in power put upon it as to its effect upon the President; nor do I know what construction the Administration which succeeded that, and of which my friend from New Jersey was a distinguished member, put upon it.

I am not prepared to say upon the instant exactly what the true construction of that portion of the section is, because my attention has not been previously called to it. But I undertake to say this much, that no provision of this law or of any other law can be so construed or so administered as to punish any officer or any private citizen for doing that which he has a lawful right to do.

I have held the floor a great deal longer than I intended. There are some other things which I would like to say, but I will not trespass longer upon the time of the committee. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. REAGAN. I will not occupy the time of the committee long, but there is one consideration which I desire to present. It seems to me that we are not discussing the true question before the committee, and that is what I desire to call attention to. We are discussing the validity and force of Rule 120 of the rules of the House of Representatives of the last Congress. I desire to say that we overlook the fact that that rule is not now in existence. It was a rule of the last House of Representatives, and the rules of that House have not yet been adopted by this House.

Yesterday, or the day before, when I suggested that we had no rules in force except general parliamentary law, Rule 147 of the last House of Representatives was read by the Speaker. That rule reads as follows:

> These rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congresses until otherwise ordered.

That rule was adopted March 19, 1860, and was read doubtless upon the supposition that it was a rule of this House.

It is not a rule of the House, nor is it a joint rule of the two Houses of Congress; it is no more a rule of the House than any other of the rules that were in force during the last Congress. It has been recognized as an established principle that the rules of a previous House are not the rules of the existing House until adopted. I maintain (and I will show some authority on the subject) that no rule adopted by a previous House of Representatives can have any binding force in the government of the present House. If this be true, then we are discussing a question not properly before the House. Mr. Cushing, in his work on the Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, lays down, on page 311, this principle:

> In the American Constitutions it is provided, generally, that each House shall have the right to determine the rules of its own proceedings. No legislative assembly, therefore, can make any rules which shall be binding upon its successors, even until abrogated or rescinded by them.

That is the doctrine laid down by Mr. Cushing; and I apprehend it is the established doctrine with all who have attempted to study this question.

> No legislative assembly, therefore, can make any rule which shall be binding upon its successors, even until abrogated or rescinded by them. Hence the system of standing orders is not in use in our legislative bodies; but it is the invariable practice for each of them, soon after its first meeting and organization, to frame and adopt a code of written rules for the government and regulation of its own proceedings.

I read also from page 312 of the same volume:

> The result of the foregoing considerations is, that after a legislative assembly meets, and until it adopts rules and orders, it is governed and its proceedings regulated by the common parliamentary law; and that when it has adopted rules and orders of its own it is governed partly by them in cases to which they apply, and partly in all cases to which the rules and orders are not applicable by rules drawn from the common parliamentary law, as above explained.

If the doctrine here laid down is true, the discussion in which we are now engaged as to whether the pending provision in this bill is admissible cannot arise under Rule 120; for that rule itself has no existence. If I am correct in my view of this question, it is a waste of time for us to discuss the force and effect of a rule which is not in existence. We are driven back to the general parliamentary law for the guidance of our legislation; and that embraces only the general rules regulating the proceedings of legislative bodies; it does not descend to particular provisions such as would exclude the section now pending.

I have thought it best to present this question now. If my position is correct, we may well waive discussion upon the other branch of the question. But in raising this point I do not wish to be understood as waiving or modifying the views which I expressed some time ago as to the true construction of Rule 120. I simply present these views to show that Rule 120 has now no force, and can have no force except by the authority of this House.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Chairman, this discussion has taken a very wide range, and has mainly been devoted to a consideration of the power of the Executive under the Constitution to control the Army and Navy of the United States. I shall not follow in that line of discussion, but will endeavor to confine my remarks entirely to the single point under consideration which is raised by the question of order made by the gentleman from Michigan. That point of order is twofold: first, that this amendment is not germane to the bill under consideration; and, secondly, that it does not on its face retrench expenditures. I desire to say a single word only on the second proposition.

Does this provision upon its face reduce expenditures? The argument on the other side is that it does, because it proposes to prevent the sending of the Army to the polls on election day; and hence it is urged the expense of transporting the Army for the purpose of executing the law will be saved. Now, Mr. Chairman, with all deference to the opinions of those who have advanced this proposition, this is a non sequitur. It does not follow because the Army is not used in the morning or at noon on election day to suppress violence at the polls, that there will result a reduction of expenditures. By no means. Gentlemen must be aware that election riots are the bloodiest riots in our history. They are not riots of the morning; they are not riots at noon on election day; but they are the riots which follow the violence perpetrated at the ballot-box upon the right of the elector; they succeed the period when the Army, under the law as it now is, might be used to suppress violence, to quell disturbance or insurrection. They arise at a much later period. To deny the use of the Army for the purpose of preventing violence at the polls on election day is no more nor less than denying the "ounce of prevention" in the morning or at noon on election day, to the end that in the bloody watches of the night which are to follow the Government shall be compelled to furnish the "pound of cure."

That is the question of economy which is wrapped up in this proposed amendment, because the expenditure of a few dollars at the proper time may save a vast expenditure later. Hence the argument may well be made that retaining the law as it is and the power of the Government as it is will result in economy and prevent expenditure rather than cause it, as is claimed on the other side. Therefore I insist, Mr. Chairman, that this provision upon its face is not a proposition which necessarily reduces expenditures, but on the contrary may lead to exactly the opposite result.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Chairman, on the point of order which has been raised upon this provision of the bill I desire simply to say a word. Rule 147 of the rules adopted by the House of Representatives in the last Congress makes those the rules of that and subsequent Houses until changed or abrogated. Hence, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the technical objection of my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] that Rule 120 is not now in force, will hold good. In what I have to say on the point of order I shall assume that Rule 120 is now in force until changed or abrogated.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman wish to be understood as affirming that the House of Representatives of 1860 or any other House of Representatives can make rules to govern the existing House?

Mr. HOOKER. I say that the House of Representatives can at any time adopt rules for the government of the House, and if declared to be continuous they remain in force until changed or abrogated. The present House has the right to make its own rules; but until it does take some action on the subject, it must be governed by the rules heretofore adopted and by the general parliamentary law. But that is aside from the question I wish to discuss.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say that Mr. Cushing, who is very high authority on a subject of this kind, affirms in his great work from which I have just read exactly the reverse of the position laid down by the gentleman. He declares that one House cannot make a rule which shall bind another, even until that rule is rescinded.

Mr. HOOKER. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this House in going into Committee of the Whole upon this bill understood that the rules of the former House would continue until the Committee on Rules should make a report upon the propositions which have been referred to them and until the House should act on that report. But this, as I have said, is a side issue; and I am not disposed to rely upon a technical objection of that kind. Presuming Rule 120 to be in existence, I support the provisions of this bill as against the point of order that they do not look to the retrenchment of expenditures.

Why, sir, the bill proposes to take from the officers of the Army and Navy wherever they may be, whoever they may be, and whatever their rank, the power to use the Army of the United States at the polls on election day. If the bill cuts off one of the means of using the Army, (and every one knows that the transportation of troops from point to point is the great burden of expense with armies,) certainly it looks in the direction of retrenchment of expenditures.

Now, it was said by my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and by other gentlemen on that side of the Chamber that this is a proposition to restrict the power of the Executive as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. It is urged that this provision proposes to take from the President some of the power with which the Constitution has clothed him. Sir, the gentleman who has referred to the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution must have observed that before the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy can send a single soldier to any State for the purpose of repressing domestic violence he must be called upon to do so by the Legislature of the State, if it be in session, or, in its absence, if it is impossible that the governor of the State can convene it in time, then by the governor himself. Hence the argument of my friend from Maine that this provision is an effort to control the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States in the ordinary functions which belong to him as such must fall to the ground.

But, sir, it is a startling proposition that any man in this land, however high his position, whatever the character of the epaulets that adorn his shoulders or the mark of rank that bedecks his uniform, stands superior to the legislative power of the country, and under the Constitution can do what the legislative power forbids. It was well said on a public occasion in that country from which we borrow our laws, by a distinguished English judge when he had occasion to pass sentence of condemnation upon a man high in rank and social position, that it was the characteristic of English law as proclaimed by English judges and administered by English jurors that no man was so high as to escape its penalties and none so low as to appeal to it in vain. So, sir, in this country no man, whatever his position or rank or commission, is so high that he must not bow his lordly head in obedience to the law of the land as proclaimed by the Commons of this country, the Representatives of the people.

It cannot, then, be said that in endeavoring to pass this provision of law, looking to one means of using the Army which has prevailed to such an extent as to attract the attention of the people and their Representatives, there is any effort to infringe or trench upon the power which legitimately belongs to the President of the United States, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy.

I might point to another clause in the Constitution the effect of which is to declare that not a soldier of the United States can be armed or equipped or prepared for contest anywhere save by the legislative authority of the Representatives of the people in Congress assembled. And if there is no power to raise an Army except that which exists here, is it not the right and duty of the people's Representatives to say when, where, how, and under what circumstances that Army shall be used? Would you say that because the President of the United States under the Constitution is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, therefore the power to create the Army must be subordinate to the will of the man who chances to occupy the official position of President? I submit, then, that the argument of gentlemen on the other side falls to the ground. The President of the United States, like every other officer and every other citizen, however exalted in rank, must bow in obedience to the law of the land.

The same provision of the Constitution to which I have just referred goes on to say (so jealous were the people of authority on this question) that the law-making power, the Representatives of the people, shall not appropriate a dollar to sustain an Army for a longer period than two years. I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, but that the wisdom of the men who framed the Constitution and placed in it this safeguard for the rights and interests of the people as against whatever authority might be in power would have been still more forcibly demonstrated had they adopted the rule which prevails in England and denies to the legislative power the right to make appropriations for the Army for more than one year.

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, following the rule which binds the English Parliament and the English executive that no moneys appropriated for the purpose of supporting the army in India shall be used for any other purpose, we might provide that the money appropriated by Congress for the support of the Army stationed upon the frontier for its defense should in its disbursement be confined specifically to that object, and that the appropriation for the support of the Army engaged in the suppression of Indian hostilities should be confined strictly to that purpose, and so on throughout.

This legislation looks, sir, to the restriction of the use of the Army at the polls, to the further prevention of the use or abuse which we know has taken place since these obnoxious laws were enacted in 1865, changing the old law adopted in 1795 and 1807. We know that the Army has been stationed at the polls during elections in violation of the great right which our fathers undertook to guard and protect when they provided that there should be no stationing of troops anywhere within one mile of the polls in any State. I say, sir, this restriction of the use of the Army does look not only to the preservation of the rights of the people, but it also looks to the retrenchment of expenditures. It looks to denying the power to the commanding officer of the Army, whatever his rank may be, at any barracks, station, or fort, to send troops to the polls in any State. It looks to the protection of a free ballot. It is not proposed to give to the Executive of the United States, be he whom he may, the power to send troops anywhere to the polls at any election held in any State. It is not proposed to give him the power to use for any such improper purpose the Army, raised, equipped, and supported by the people, and which is the Army of the people and not the Army of the officers of this Government, whether high or low in rank; and therefore the Representatives of the people have the right to say when that Army shall be moved, where it shall be moved, and how it shall be used. And, sir, having that right, they surely have the right to say that it shall not be used in any particular way by which not only the public expenditures will be largely increased, but no proper and useful service will be rendered either to the Government or the people.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address the House on this subject for a short time, but I do not feel able to go on this evening. We will hardly be able to get to a vote to-night. It is an important question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. STEPHENS. It seems the debate has taken a wide range, going into the merits of the main question, and I might as well make my remarks before the decision of the point of order as afterward. If, however, it is the desire of the House to decide the point of order this evening, as it is quite late I will postpone what I have to say.

Mr. WHITE. Go on.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not feel able to go on this evening.

Mr. WHITE. Then let us rise, and the gentleman can go on to-morrow.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is what I wish.

Mr. SPARKS. Let me suggest that the point of order be decided, and then the discussion to-morrow can proceed on the merits of the question.

Mr. STEPHENS. It will take a day to decide it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the committee might as well rise.

Mr. SPARKS. In accordance with the wish of the gentleman from Georgia, I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPARKS, (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 29, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires, in view of a discussion which took place yesterday in the Committee of the Whole, (which he had not the opportunity of hearing,) wherein a question was raised as to the existence of the rules of the House, and particularly as to the existence of Rule 120, to give at this time in an intelligent manner the history of the adoption of Rule 147. He does not desire to argue the point, but merely to present the facts for the information of the House.

The Clerk will first read the remarks of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Yesterday, or the day before, when I suggested that we had no rules in force except general parliamentary law, Rule 147 of the last House of Representatives was read by the Speaker. The rule reads as follows:

"These rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congresses until otherwise ordered."

Again:

I have thought it best to present this question now. If my position is correct, we may well waive discussion upon the other branch of the question. But in raising this point I do not wish to be understood as waiving or modifying the views which I expressed some time ago as to the true construction of Rule 120. I simply present these views to show that Rule 120 has now no force, and can have no force except by the authority of this House.

The SPEAKER. Rule 147 was adopted on the 16th of March, 1860, and the Clerk will now read the debate which took place at the time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Maine. I now offer the following amendment:

"All elections of officers of the House, including the Speaker, shall be conducted in accordance with these rules as far as the same are applicable; and pending the election of Speaker, the Clerk shall preserve order and decorum, and he shall decide all questions of order that may arise, subject to appeal to the House.

"These rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congresses, unless otherwise ordered."

Mr. REAGAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that we can only bind future Congresses by an act of Congress and not by the rules.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Maine. The House makes its own rules. It has the right and power under the Constitution to do so.

Mr. NOELL. I desire to know of the gentleman from Maine what he intends to do with that provision of the Constitution which gives to "each House" the right to make its own rules of procedure; not that one House shall have a right to make rules for the next House, but that each House shall have a right to make its own rules? I would like to know what he intends to do with that provision of the Constitution?

Mr. GROW. This amendment does not so provide. It does not control the action of any succeeding House in making its rules. They can make them when they please; but until they do make rules, these will stand, just as Jefferson's Manual is now regarded, as the authority until rules are adopted which interfere with them. The amendment only provides that these shall continue in force until the next House chooses to change them.

Mr. NOELL. The gentleman does not answer my question. My question is, what has this House got to do with making rules for the next House?

Mr. GROW. That is just what I am trying to answer.

Mr. NOELL. How can you make rules that will apply to the action of the House not now in existence?

Mr. GROW. We do not make rules for the next House. We only provide that these rules shall continue in force until the next House chooses to change them; and if they choose to sit during the whole session without altering them, then they adopt them as their rules by their own action. The House of Representatives continues under the Constitution without interregnum just as much as the Senate. This idea that there is a period of time when there is no Congress, under our Constitution, goes on the supposition that there is a period of time when there is no government. There is a Congress in existence, under the Constitution, all the time; and when the House meets here the Constitution says they shall select their Speaker. If you have not a House, how are you going to elect a Speaker? They are just as much a House of Representatives, under the Constitution, the day they meet as they are after they have elected a Speaker; they are not organized under the forms they choose to adopt; that is all. Up to the time when they choose to adopt rules, by their acquiescence in these they will make them their own rules, so that they will not be left at any time without rules.

The SPEAKER. In the Thirty-seventh Congress Mr. Grow, then Speaker, made the statement which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remark that he would construe the rules of the last House as continuing in force until otherwise ordered, but he sees no objection to the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Mr. Grow of course, as Speaker, was also a member of the Committee on Rules, and the Chair is unable to find any decision to the contrary.

Mr. MILLS. I ask that there may be also read what I have marked here in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. CALKINS. I ask that Speaker Kerr's decision in the Forty-fourth Congress be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have everything read that is sent to the desk. The Chair repeats that he does not wish to argue the question. He merely wants to give to the House the history of Rule 147.

Mr. MILLS. Will the Chair please to have read in this connection what I have marked? It is the ruling of Speaker Kerr.

Mr. CALKINS. I suppose that is the same I desire to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-third Congress shall be the rules of the House of Representatives until otherwise ordered, except Rule 166 and Rule 167.

"Resolved further, That a committee of five, to consist of the Speaker and four members, to be named by him, be appointed, to whom shall be referred the rules of the House, who shall report all such amendments or revisions of the same as they shall think proper, and such reports shall always be in order to be made."

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. I object to the resolutions under the existing rules, which are our rules without a declaration of this sort.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that both these resolutions are strictly in order. I propose that we adopt the rules of the last House with the exceptions stated. As to the second resolution, I will say there is no rule providing for the appointment of a Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is therefore mistaken on this point.

Mr. GARFIELD. That particular point is not what I object to. I object to the first branch of the gentleman's resolutions, on the ground of immemorial usage.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has a perfect right to object by voting against the resolutions, but in no other manner.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit that this is not a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make that point of order?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules it, on the ground that the Constitution clearly gives to each House the right to adopt its own rules. Whatever may have been the rules or orders of a preceding House in reference to this matter, they cannot supersede the constitutional right of this House to adopt its own rules.

Mr. RANDALL. The Speaker is clearly right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will now send up the passage he desires to have read.

Mr. CALKINS. It is the decision of Speaker Kerr, which has just been read.

The SPEAKER. The then Speaker did not make a decision, but simply stated, as the Chair understands the language, that the constitutional right of the House to make its own rules could not be superseded. The Chair thinks that is correct; it cannot. But, in the absence of action, the concurrent ruling of the Speakers has indicated that there must be some rules, and it is with that view that Rule 147 was adopted and given its scope. The Chair does not wish to be led into a discussion or a decision upon the question until the occasion arises.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to call attention to one matter. I think it was decided the other day that the introduction of any rules for the government of this House was not a privileged question, and that that could not be introduced except by unanimous consent. I believe that the question of the adoption of rules for the government of this House is as thoroughly a part of the organization of this House, and therefore privileged, as the determination of the question who shall be sworn, because as the Constitution guarantees to each House the right to adopt such rules as it chooses for its guidance, the House cannot proceed properly and in order until it shall have adopted some such rules. I submit, therefore, that the adoption of a set of rules for the government of this House is a privileged question and can come in at any time. I desire the Speaker to make a proper examination of that question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do so. The Chair desires to have read in this connection a passage from the Manual which shows the reason why he stated that he would allow resolutions to amend the rules to come in on Monday; but he did not, as is supposed, decide the question whether a proposition to amend the rules was or was not a privileged question.

The Clerk read as follows:

A resolution to amend the rules may be read and referred to the Committee on Rules during the first call of the States and Territories in the morning hour on Monday, and thus constitutes notice, according to the usages of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was desirous there should be no conflict on that point between the two sides of the House.

Mr. McMAHON. That supposes the rules were adopted.

The SPEAKER. That is supposing that Rule 147 would operate. The Chair thinks it should be a subject of privilege.

Mr. REAGAN. Inquiries are arising continually whether we can proceed without rules.

The SPEAKER. That is a natural inquiry.

Mr. REAGAN. Section 793 of Cushing's Manual reads as follows:

The result of the foregoing considerations is that after a legislative assembly meets, and until it adopts rules and orders, it is governed and its proceedings regulated by the common parliamentary law; and that when it has adopted rules and orders of its own it is governed partly by them, in cases to which they apply, and partly, in all cases to which the rules and orders are not applicable, by rules drawn from the common parliamentary law, as above explained.

Further, on reference to paragraph 777, it will be seen what laws govern us before we adopt rules. It says:

The forms and methods of proceeding in the British Parliament, especially those which prevail in the House of Commons which has served as a model for most of the legislative assemblies of the present day, are the fruit of more than two centuries of the wisdom and experience of that celebrated body. They are founded partly in usages which are nowhere recorded in express terms on the journals, but are constantly recognized and practiced upon; as, for example, the rule that a bill before passing is to be read three times on three several days; partly in resolutions and precedents of proceedings which are considered as declaratory of the law and usage of Parliament; partly in orders made from time to time for the purpose of regulating the proceedings; and partly in statutes or acts of Parliament.

That I understand to be an embodiment of the illustration of the sources of parliamentary rule, and the common law which prevails when we have no rules.

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt but that in a body organized without rules the common parliamentary practice suggested in Cushing's Manual and just read would apply. That is not the point or controversy here. The point of controversy is as to Rule 147.

Mr. MILLS. Will my colleague allow me to make a suggestion for a moment?

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a few words more, and then I will not trouble the Chair.

The SPEAKER. There is no trouble; the Chair wants to be advised.

Mr. REAGAN. Section 792 of Cushing's Manual says:

In the American constitutions it is provided generally that each house shall have the right to determine the rules of its own proceedings. No legislative assembly, therefore, can make any rules which shall be binding upon its successors even until abrogated or rescinded by them.

The SPEAKER. That brings up the point made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McMAHON] that there is a constitutional right to alter the rules.

The Chair thinks that the position taken by the gentleman from Ohio is probably the correct one, but the distinction is this: that that constitutional right is not superseded in any manner by the adoption of the one hundred and forty-seventh rule, because it does not take from the body the right to change its rules at any time.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to address myself to the point in discussion. We either have the rules of the Forty-fifth and previous Congresses, or we have them not. If the House is not bound by the rules of the Forty-fifth Congress, it is impossible for it to adopt any rules, and it is shorn of its sovereign power to adopt rules. If it adopts the rules of the Forty-fifth Congress, then it adopts Rule 145; and that rule says:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor; nor shall any rule be suspended except by a vote of at least two-thirds of the members present.

Now the rules of the House now existing require that any amendment intended to be effected in the body of the rules should be referred to the Committee on Rules, and the House has no power over the subject. The Committee on Rules may put the amendment in its pocket and retain it, and thus deprive the House of the constitutional power to make rules for the government of its own proceedings.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. By the consent of the gentleman from Texas, I will call attention to another section of Cushing's Manual, section 274, in which it is declared that the Clerk has no power to organize the House save by the suffrage of the members present. I wish to read it:

In the mean time the Clerk of the last House is suffered to act as Clerk. The duty of the latter to act as Clerk of the new House and initiate the steps necessary to its organization is founded merely in custom and usage, copied doubtless from the practice which prevails in the House of Commons. But in the latter the clerk is already appointed; whereas in the House of Representatives in Congress, the Clerk derives his appointment only from the last House, the authority of which expires with itself.

The SPEAKER. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois, the Chair desires to state that the law regulates the duties of the Clerk in organizing the House, and not a rule of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am aware of that, but I submitted it as an illustration of principle.

The SPEAKER. On that point the Chair desires to say, that Rule 147 evidently meant this: that instead of entering on the broad sea of parliamentary law as constructed by various examples in legislative bodies, the House (until it has exercised its constitutional right to make rules) be governed by the rules of the prior House of Congress instead of entering on the broad sea of parliamentary practice in the history of legislative bodies.

Mr. McMAHON. In that connection I desire to call attention to this fact: the House of Representatives is not a continuing body; it expires every two years. The Senate of the United States is a continuing body; it never expires.

The SPEAKER. That point was touched by Speaker Grow.

Mr. McMAHON. In the last session of this House this question came up before the Committee of Accounts in reference to the employment of certain officers and employés of this House other than those provided for by statute. On that occasion the Committee of Accounts took the ground that an order of one House of Representatives that A B should be employed, outside of the statute, as a messenger "until the further order of the House" did not bind the subsequent House, for the reason that the power of the House to employ these special officers outside of the law expired with that House.

Now, if Rule 147 of the last House was enacted into a law, then it would or might bind this House of Representatives until the House chose to change the rules. We would then have something to stand upon, because it is competent for the Congress of the United States to determine by what law and rules the House of Representatives shall be guided, unless the House of Representatives chooses to assert its constitutional right to alter those rules.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think that a bill passed by the two Houses of Congress and signed by the President and made a law should bind this House in regard to its rules in view of the provision of the Constitution? Would it not be yielding the right to make its own rules?

Mr. McMAHON. No, sir. The language of the Constitution is that the House may adopt rules. If the House does not adopt rules then it is under the guidance of parliamentary law. The law of Congress would not be in derogation of the constitutional right of the House to adopt its own rules.

The point I desire to make is this: parliamentary law is as well defined and distinctive a branch of law as is the common law of the country or the civil law of Europe. You do not find it printed anywhere under the authority of statute, but it is a well defined and understood body of law. When a parliamentary body is organized, unless it adopts other rules for its guidance, it is guided by parliamentary law.

So in this case. When the House of Representatives assembles it is guided by parliamentary law, unless it exercises its constitutional privilege to adopt its own rules, which it may do at any time.

The SPEAKER. Does not the gentleman think that if the House should consent to the enactment of a law upon that subject it would be a waiving of the constitutional right given to the House to make its own rules?

Mr. McMAHON. Not at all. For example, the House of Representatives of the Forty-fifth Congress could not under any circumstances by the enactment of a law waive the constitutional privilege that belongs to the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress.

Whenever the House of Representatives of this Congress came into existence it was invested eo instanti with all the vigor and power that is conferred upon it by the constitutional provision which declares that each House may adopt its own rules, and no provision of any previous House, I do not care by how solemn an act it may be set forth, can prevent the House of Representatives upon assembling from adopting such rules as it pleases.

The SPEAKER. The Chair admitted the petition presented the other day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] himself, under the provisions of the rules of this House.

Mr. MCMAHON. I beg the Speaker's pardon. I claimed and intended to argue the point that I presented the petition under the broad ground of parliamentary law, broader than the rules of this House. Under parliamentary law there is no provision requiring that a petition shall be put into a box and from that box sent to a committee. Under parliamentary law each petition must be presented to the House, considered by the House, and by the House referred to a committee. It was under the broad parliamentary law that I insisted upon my right to present that petition. It was my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] who made the point that under the rules of the House the petition must go into the petition-box.

The SPEAKER. And the Chair overruled that point.

Mr. MCMAHON. And very properly, too, because I was not only exercising a right under general parliamentary law, but I rose to a question of privilege, the right of a member to a seat upon the floor of this House. I am perfectly willing to act under the rules of the old House and will vote for a resolution adopting them for the time being. But I want this House to start right. I do not want to see any false precedents laid down. I do not want to see the rights of the House of Representatives allowed to fall to the ground. I do not want to see a rule which is a mere creature of the last House of Representatives set up for our guidance against our right to make our own rules. There is no authority for any such assertion; no power for the assertion of such a rule. The House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth Congress can make rules for itself, but it cannot make rules in any form for the House of Representatives of the Forty-seventh Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think so. The Chair does not construe that the right of the House to make its own rules is superseded at all by the one hundred and forty-seventh rule. The House might just as well resort to the rules of a former House for its guidance as to resort to the general rules of parliamentary practice. That was evidently the purpose of the adoption of the one hundred and forty-seventh rule of March, 1860.

Mr. ELAM. I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. SPARKS. I understood that I had the floor when the Speaker proceeded to make this explanation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] has the floor; but the Chair would like to hear what the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELAM] desires to submit, and would also like to hear the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. ELAM. I desire to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-fifth Congress of the United States be, and the same are hereby, adopted.

The SPEAKER. There is already a resolution of that sort pending.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to add a word to what has been said by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Illinois will waive his motion for a moment.

Mr. SPARKS. Very well.

Mr. CONGER. I simply wish to call the attention of the Chair to a suggestion in the remarks of Mr. Grow in 1860, which to me seems to have considerable force, although it was not enlarged upon by Mr. Grow, and has not been referred to in the present discussion. The constitutional provision is that—

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

Now, I submit that the phrase "each House" does not mean each renewed House of Representatives; but the Constitution, referring alike to the two Houses of Congress, provides that each of them may make its own rules independently of the other. This is the great constitutional point, as I take it; and Mr. Grow, in his remarks, merely alluded to it.

Now, if it be true that all the rules of the House of Representatives are vacated upon the termination of the official life of its members, it could equally be said that all rules adopted in the other branch of Congress expire with the change of its members. It happens, however, that the Senate is a continuing body in this sense, that two-thirds of its old members are always understood to continue in office at the opening of each new Congress.

Now, the power of this House to make its own rules is conferred upon it as one of the two branches of Congress; the power is not by the language of the Constitution intended to apply specifically to each renewed House of Representatives.

I wish to call the attention of the Chair to another point. It is admitted by all that each successive House of Representatives as organized is subject at any rate to the general rules of parliamentary law, if not to any formal rules which may have been previously adopted. Now, I submit that in the case of a long-existing constitutional body like the House of Representatives the natural and proper criterion for determining the rules of the body would be to refer to those rules which by usage, by custom, by prescription, by enactment, or in any other way, may have been established as the rules of that particular body, rather than to refer to the more general principles of parliamentary law which may or may not in their entirety have received the sanction of that particular body. In other words, it would seem proper to look to the last expression of the will of the House in reference to the parliamentary rules which should govern it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be the best example to follow.

Mr. CONGER. The best criterion as to the parliamentary rules applicable to that body.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to say one word in reply to my friend from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. SPARKS. I must ask the House to go on with the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I shall not occupy more than a moment. Some of my friends here contend that to recognize as of binding force any rule adopted by a preceding House is in contravention of the Constitution; that each House must make its own rules. Now, sir, the proposition is perfectly clear that where a deliberative body has prescribed no rules for its government, then the general parliamentary law comes in to control it; and if it never adopts any specific rules, that general parliamentary law continues to govern it. On the other hand, where a preceding House adopts rules for a succeeding House and the latter acquiesces, then by virtue of this acquiescence the general parliamentary law does not apply except so far as the specific rules are silent. When gentlemen concede that the general parliamentary law governs until specific rules are adopted, they concede the whole question and admit that the rules of the last Congress operate until new rules are adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considing the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a question of order. I desire a decision of the Chair upon the point which has now been discussed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot have any decision from the Chair until some question is raised requiring a decision.

Mr. CALKINS. In order to obtain a decision I raise the point that the motion to go into Committee of the Whole is a motion under the rules of the House of Representatives, and that we have no rules. I raise this question for the simple purpose of having the Chair decide whether the rules adopted by the House in the Forty-fifth Congress are in force and govern this House.

The SPEAKER. Assuming that the rules are in force this is a motion to suspend them.

Mr. CONGER. I hope my friend from Indiana will not press that point. The Chair has intimated his desire to examine the question and will decide upon it when it arises.

Mr. CALKINS. On the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan, I withdraw my point for the present.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SPARKS that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, the motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPARKS. We have been discussing for several hours the point of order I wished to speak on yesterday evening. That discussion has taken a very wide range, involving the merits of the proposition itself. Now, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that it would be well either now or at a very early period to have a ruling upon the point of order, after which the discussion, as a matter of course, will proceed upon the merits of the pending proposition.

Mr. STEPHENS. It was not my purpose yesterday evening when I got the floor to go into the general discussion of the merits of the proposition; it was mainly my object to discuss the point of order which has been raised, and necessarily in that connection to refer to the merits of the pending proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman allow the Chair a moment?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia propose to proceed with his remarks now? Whatever course he desires to pursue, of course the Chair and the committee will agree to.

Mr. STEPHENS. I was proceeding, and I have but a few remarks to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requests members to resume their seats and remain seated, in order that all the members in the Hall may be able to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suggest that the gentleman from Georgia come into the middle aisle.

Mr. STEPHENS. If gentlemen will remain seated every member can hear all I have to say.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I beg to suggest that any remarks made now shall be addressed solely to the point of order.

Mr. SPARKS. I hope not; I hope the remarks made now will be made as yesterday.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the point of order be first disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not undertake to restrict members in their arguments any more than was done upon yesterday.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have the floor, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. STEPHENS. It was my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to say but little outside of the point of order. Necessarily some remarks have to be made on the proposition in connection with it, but after what has been said this morning in the discussion of the rules I have but little to say on that subject. What I intended to say was that whether the rules of the last Congress are our rules now or not would not influence my opinion on the admissibility, relevancy, and pertinency of this amendment. I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that one Congress cannot bind another as to the rules which shall govern it. It is true the other day, when the Speaker held that the rules of the last Congress were binding and the House did not raise the question and appeal from it, I am not prepared to say that we were not then bound by that ruling. That is the strongest argument to my mind on that point.

But apart from that suppose that Rule 120 does govern; suppose we take that view of it, that it is the law of our Government. Then it is to be construed as all other laws are. We must look to the old law, to the mischief and the remedy. I will not detain the House now by going through with a history of this rule. Let us for this argument accept it as the law controlling our action in deciding the question whether this section is such new legislation as is excluded by the rule. It is known that I was opposed to the policy of putting this provision on this appropriation bill. But the policy of doing it and the right to do it are different questions. The question now is, is the section excluded by the rule the accepted law of the House?

All laws penal in their character are to be strictly construed, but laws involving questions of public right, public liberty, public policy, are to be liberally construed. Rule 120 provides that any change in existing laws upon appropriation bills must not only be germane, but must be in the nature of retrenchment of expenditures.

There is no question this amendment is germane, none. Does it retrench expenditures? The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] says it must appear on its face that it does reduce expenditures. That is strict construction. May it possibly reduce expenditures? Will it probably reduce expenditures? Will it most probably reduce expenditures? These are considerations which we should not neglect or overlook. If it does, if it probably may, if it possibly may, if it does not increase them, but possibly may reduce them and most probably will, then that liberal construction which I insist should be made of this rule would make us conclude the proposition is admissible under the one hundred and twentieth rule.

That is my opinion. I think it will not only possibly and probably but certainly reduce expenditures. Our past history and experience show that enormous expenditures have attended the use of troops at the polls during elections. Our past experience is, as I think all will admit, that there is not only a possibility and a probability but a certainty that it will reduce expenditures. It is by construction, I admit. We have not only the right but it is our duty in construing rules which involve questions of great public policy to construe them liberally.

One word now upon the merits of this question, and that is in regard to the history of the use of the Army in civil administration. I will state it that way.

There seems to be some disagreement and lack of information among members. The calling out of troops to suppress insurrection and violence, referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] yesterday, is a very different provision from the use of the troops in civil administration, totally different. The President, first, by the act of 1795, was authorized, in cases set forth by the Constitution, to call out, not the militia of the State, no; but to put down an insurrection against a State, to preserve the integrity of the State, guaranteeing a republican government under the Constitution, he was authorized to call out the militia of adjoining States. That is the law of 1795. It is not to be presumed that the governor would not call out the militia in his own State, and the militia of adjoining States was to be called out when it was necessary to put down an insurrection in a State. That is the legitimate use of the military power of the country under the act of 1795.

Now, it was not until 1807 that the organized Army, the military force and the naval force was authorized to be called out for a like purpose, to protect the States against domestic violence and insurrection. That law also went further, or some subsequent law—I have not, from indisposition, been able to look up these laws as I expected to do last night, but the provision of the law for the use of the troops in civil cases is entirely a different matter. It is where provision is made for the execution of a mandate or judgment of a court. The generals are not to command the troops in such cases, but the marshals. The civil officers, as the sheriffs in our States, were authorized to call for the use of the troops, and the President was authorized to furnish them to the Legislature or to the governor when the Legislature was not in session or the marshals for the execution of the mandate of a court. That is what I call the execution of process in civil administration of the law. That is a very different thing from the other—the use of troops to suppress insurrection and domestic violence in a State upon the call of a Legislature or the governor as provided by the Constitution.

Wherever the marshal calls for troops, as was decided by Attorney-General Cushing, as was remarked in yesterday's debate, it was as a posse, not as the Army. The United States troops were called upon and they were furnished as a posse comitatus to execute the law. They were under the command, not of the United States military officers, but under the command of the marshal who asked for them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, upon the subject of the use of the troops to keep the peace at elections I have only to repeat what was so well and so often said yesterday. Such a provision never had existence on the statute-book of the United States until after 1860, after the war. This act of 1865 which it is proposed to modify got into existence rather strangely. The law set out by stating that no officer, &c., should order troops, or have them at any election in any State, except for certain purposes, mainly to keep the peace at the polls. It was a negative affirmative. That is, it thus legalized the use of the Army. That is the way in which it appeared upon the statute-book.

The danger of such a law, I suppose, in this age and in the enlightened condition of public sentiment the world over need not be argued. The whole of this amendment is simply this: all the new legislation it proposes, or change of legislation, is to repeal that clause which negatively affirms that the troops might be called out and ordered by military commanders to attend at elections under pretense of keeping the peace. That is all of it. The whole thing might have been embodied simply in the expression that all laws that authorize the use of troops to preserve peace at elections should be repealed. That would accomplish the whole object. The use of the other words in the act of 1865 amounts to nothing. The whole of that section was to cover that one thing, to preserve the peace at the polls.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there is a man on this floor who is in favor of peaceable elections and order throughout the length and breadth of this country, I profess to be equally strong with him in that wish and desire. Purity of elections is the greatest safeguard of liberty. I am for law and order. I have witnessed the presence of soldiers at the polls. I have seen no good from their presence. We had gotten along for three-quarters of a century without it. I think the public sentiment is as much against the use of the troops to preserve the peace North as it is South. That the Government of the United States has got a right to control by law, alter, change, and prescribe the rules and manner of holding the election of members of Congress, I am not going to discuss here. It is not pertinent to this question. But we have got along well for many years without this provision; and I think that the future peace and harmony of the whole country, law, order, and prosperity will be greatly promoted by hereafter adhering to the principles and practice and methods of the fathers of the Republic from the beginning down for more than three quarters of a century. Let the relics and vestiges of the war be buried with the things of the past. I do insist that there will be no harm done, no unsettling of our institutions, no revolution in our matchless system of government, by the repeal of this law. It seems to me, therefore, this amendment being germane, regulating the use and the control of the Army, and being also within the purview of a liberal construction of the rule, it is admissible on this bill.

Now, as to the use of the Army, I wish in connection with some remarks which were offered yesterday on both sides upon this subject to state this: Congress has got a right to raise armies. Congress has got a right to designate the use to which the forces, naval or military, may be applied. But the President's right to control and direct the movements of those forces from one part of the country to the other, enlarging the declared function of Congress, is a clear executive right. We have no power to interfere with it, except by impeachment for the abuse of power conferred. But we can say that he shall not use the forces for any particular purposes. We have a right to say this—and I do not think the present Executive would desire it to be otherwise—we have a right to say the forces, land and naval, of the United States shall not be used for the purpose of controlling elections in the States, but that the elections shall be free and fair according to the laws of the land, State and Federal; and if any man violates the law, if there has been any violence at the polls, and a member of Congress has not been duly returned, we are to judge of it here on this floor, and we can set the return aside. Let the land and naval forces of our country be devoted to the objects for which they were raised by Congress. Let the Army protect the frontier. Let the Navy be afloat on the seas protecting our flag and our commerce everywhere. Let each branch of these forces be kept in that sphere they were created for and in which in past years they have won such honor and glory to our common country.

Let them be performing their duties and let the civil administration of the Government go on in its own channel. Let members of Congress be returned as heretofore; and if any man has been deprived of his right to his seat here, then let this high constitutional court, the House of Representatives, decide that question, and not submit it to the decision of bayonets instead of ballots. That is all I desire to say on the point of order, and it is much more than I expected to say.

Mr. REED. I am very well aware of the high estimation in which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] is held by this House, and I certainly should hesitate to oppose any views of his unless I felt myself fortified by reasons which are worthy of the attention of the House. I do not purpose to say anything on the merits of the main question. I purpose to confine myself to the question of the point of order, and I do so because I believe that the point of order is of itself of national as well as parliamentary importance. I believe that it is of importance, not only in this case, but for all coming time.

The tendency of the rules and the practice of the House has been for many years to concentrate an immense power in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. So great has been that tendency that the gentleman who is now occupying the chair seized the first opportunity to introduce a proposition to deprive them of a certain portion of their power. But an amendment like this in its principle goes further; it goes not only to increase the power of the Committee on Appropriations, but it also aggrandizes the power of the conference committee and leaves the decision of grave questions to six men, three appointed from the House and three from the Senate.

Whenever the House can propose an amendment which is germane to the bill and which repeals existing legislation simply because this amendment reduces expenditures they raise grounds of possible difference between the House and the Senate and those questions must go to a conference committee, and every one who knows anything of the legislation of Congress knows that a large part of the most important legislation is decided by three men from the House and three men from the Senate. And the decision takes place in secret without any of the safeguards which ought to surround legislation.

Now, this thing is wrong. It is undemocratic; it is unrepublican. It is unsuitable for this nation and this people, and consequently any rule which allows an amendment of this sort ought to be construed strictly for the good of the country.

Rule 120 demands two things; first, that the amendment shall be germane to the bill; and, second, that it shall reduce expenditures. On the proposition as to the reduction of expenditures there has already been a decision by the first Speaker under whom this rule was adopted, Speaker Kerr, and his ruling, as I understand it, was that the amendment must upon its face show a reduction of expenditures. It is not a matter of argument or inference, or a question for discussion.

Why, this very case illustrates the necessity for this thing. This amendment contains two propositions: first, that no troops shall be employed at the polls; second, that men shall be punished if they have troops there. Is that last clause going to lessen expenditures in any way, or is it going to increase expenditures to punish men for being there? Your first clause may diminish expenses, but the last will certainly increase them. Who shall strike the balance? The thing is as broad as it is long. I say that the Chair ought to rule in such a fashion that an amendment shall not be admitted unless upon its face it shows affirmatively that it does reduce expenditures.

But I do not rest my objection so much upon the question of the reduction of expenditures as upon the question of whether the amendment is germane to the bill. I ask the attention of the Chair to some propositions I have to make. I trust I shall not have, as my colleague [Mr. FRYE] did the other day, to apologize for what I am going to say, but I think now that this chairman has some regard for his position as a parliamentarian and a desire to do justice.

Mr. FRYE. You will.

Mr. REED. Here is an amendment which embraces three statements and is to a bill to appropriate money for the support of the Army, one which relates solely to the Army appropriation. The largest extent that can be given to matters germane to it will only include matters that relate to the Army, I should say myself to Army expenditures alone, but taking the widest and broadest limit you can put to it, it can only include matters that relate to the Army but not those that relate to naval and civil officers.

Here are three propositions in this amendment. The first is that no military officer shall have under his authority troops at polling places. Now, even if that could be construed as being germane to an appropriation bill, here is also a proposition that no naval officer shall have any armed men at the polls. How is that germane to an army appropriation bill? Here is a further provision that no person engaged in the civil service of the United States shall have armed men there. How is that consistent with a bill which relates solely to the appropriations for the support of the Army?

I say that so far from its being germane to the bill, as stated by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] it is, to the mind of any disinterested person, clearly not germane. You cannot mix up the naval and civil officers of the Government and drag them into an Army appropriation bill, simply because the proposed section refers as well to the Army officers.

So I put the proposition to the Chair simply and succinctly, first, this section does not upon its face retrench expenditure. It is therefore the duty of the Chair, in the interest of parliamentary law and of this nation, to construe this provision of the rules with the same strictness that the former Speaker, Mr. Kerr, construed the same provision. Second, this amendment is not germane to the bill, because this is an Army expenditure bill. Even if a proposition to restrain Army officers were germane to the bill, a proposition that citizens in civil life and members of the naval force of the country shall be restrained also cannot for a moment be tolerated as germane.

I desire to say one word further. Even if the proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is correct, that the rules of the last House are not the rules of this House, nevertheless this provision ought to be germane according to modern parliamentary law. To be germane it must get over the objections which I have already presented. But I take it that the Chair purposes to be governed by the rules of the last House, especially after what has transpired in this House this morning.

Therefore I confine myself to that proposition, and I urge upon the Chair the duty that rests upon him under all these circumstances to decide this question for the best interests of the country and of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us have the decision of the Chair now.

Mr. SPARKS. There is a quasi agreement that the Chair shall now rule upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order.

Mr. SPARKS. And the duty of so ruling now devolves upon the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. In deciding this point of order the Chair will not take shelter behind the fact that the rules of the last House have not formally been adopted as the rules of this House. Without any expression of opinion upon that point, the Chair will take the responsibility of deciding this question upon its merits. The point of order raised upon the pending section is this: that it changes existing law, that it is not germane to the pending bill, and that it does not retrench expenditures. Rule 120 provides that no proposition in an appropriation bill, or an amendment thereto, which changes existing law, shall be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures. That the pending section changes existing law appears on its face. That it is germane to the pending bill there can scarcely be a doubt. It relates to the duties of the Army, or the uses to which it may be put. The object of the bill is to provide a support for the Army. A kindred subject to that would be the kind of service the Army is expected to perform. The duties to be performed are closely allied to the matter of Army support. "Germane" does not mean synonymous, but something "near akin," "closely allied," or "relevant" to the subject-matter to which it is applied. The Chair is therefore of the opinion that the section is germane to the pending bill.

But the most serious question involved is this: Does the section retrench expenditures? In considering this question the Chair will take into view the Constitution of the United States, the acts of Congress, the provisions of the pending bill, the parliamentary rules and practices of the House, and any official documents of which a court might take judicial cognizance. The Constitution confers upon Congress the power—

> To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years;
> * * * * * * *
> To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;
>
> And
> To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

Congress therefore creates the Army. It provides its support. It makes the rules for its government. And although the President is, by the Constitution, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, yet Congress must make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested in him as such commander. Congress may therefore fix the places where troops may or may not be stationed, and may prohibit the President and all civil and military officers from using the Army for any purpose deemed improper, or from interfering with the freedom of elections, or from doing any act dangerous to the liberties of the people. The sections of the Revised Statutes, namely, 2002 and 5528, which the pending section proposes to amend, as well as sections 2003, 5529, 5530, and 5531, make it unlawful for officers in the military or naval service of the United States to do certain specified things concerning elections, under severe penalties. The Chair takes cognizance of the fact that the proposed amendments, embraced in section 6 of the pending bill, change existing law only to the extent of striking out of sections 2002 and 5528 of the Revised Statutes the words "or to keep the peace at the polls," and that if the words should be stricken out as proposed it would be made unlawful to use the Army for such purpose. By existing law the Army or any part thereof may now be used to keep the peace at the polls at any voting place, at any election, to which the President or any civil or military officer might see fit to order it. The official estimates and appropriations heretofore made show how much money has been expended for transportation and other expenses attending the use of troops at the polls. The pending section proposes to retrench such expenditures for the future.

If it were lawful to use troops as policemen in cities, as sheriffs and constables for serving civil processes, as guards for State prisons, or as messengers for carrying the mails or the transportation of merchandise for private individuals, would not such enlarged duties greatly increase the expense of supporting the Army? As the enlarging of the duties of the Army would necessarily increase the expenses of supporting it, so will the restricting of the uses to which it may be put reduce such expenses. In so far, then, as the services which may be required of the Army, or any part thereof, are restricted by the pending amendment the expense necessarily attending such service is reduced, and to that extent the pending provision does retrench expenditures.

For these reasons, and others which might be assigned, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Lest the decision of the Chair should be supposed to go unquestioned, and as I think many differ from the Chair in reference to it, I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and in order to save time I ask that the vote upon the appeal may be taken by tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? Upon that question the gentleman from Michigan demands tellers, and the Chair will take the responsibility of appointing them without the formal order of the committee. The Chair therefore appoints the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. CONGER, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SPARKS, as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 125, noes 107.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. NEW. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk to the first paragraph of the pending section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That nothing contained in this section as now amended shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States, under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under and to enable the United States to comply with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or Executive as provided for in said section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] may be regarded as having been read for information; but the pending section is not now open for amendment and discussion under the five-minute rule. By general consent of the Committee of the Whole all general debate on the bill was reserved for this section, and when that general debate shall have been closed by order of the House the section will then be open for amendment and discussion under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill, [Mr. SPARKS,] inasmuch as the same ruling will undoubtedly be made upon the next paragraph of the pending section unless there should be a desire to discuss the point of order upon it which will be raised—I ask that the next clause may be read and the point of order raised upon it and formally decided. Then the general debate may run upon both clauses, so that all may speak upon the two clauses of the section at once.

Mr. SPARKS. I understood that the point of order was raised upon the whole section, embracing both clauses.

Mr. CONGER. It was not intended to be so, because the other clause had not been read when the point of order was raised, and has not yet been read.

Mr. SPARKS. It is all one section, involving the same principle, and my understanding was that the ruling of the Chair covered the whole section. If I am mistaken in that, however, I am willing that the decision shall now be made.

Mr. CONGER. The point of order was raised upon the first paragraph, and before the whole section was read.

Mr. KNOTT. The whole section was read.

Mr. SPARKS. The whole section was read and the point of order was then raised.

Mr. CONGER. Very well; I did not so understand it; but if that be so then the point I desire to make has already been disposed of, and the general discussion will embrace both clauses of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. CONGER. We shall desire separate votes upon the two paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly; that will be the right of any member.

Mr. SPARKS. As stated by the Chair, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] is not now in order, but will be when we come to consider the section under the five-minute rule. As this discussion on the point of order has taken a wide range, involving really the merits of the proposition itself, I would like to know from gentlemen on the other side whether they can indicate about what time they would like for general discussion on the section. I want it distinctly understood that I do not wish to hurry this matter at all; I wish to give the opposite side, as well as this, full latitude in debating this question.

Mr. CONGER. As I have said to the gentleman in private, I have understood that on this side of the House quite a number of gentlemen wish to take part in this discussion; of course I do not know how many, but I know that there will be a sufficient number, if they engage at length in the discussion, to occupy, with those who may alternate with them on the other side, the entire day. Hence I think it would not be well to attempt at this time to limit the debate. As I have already suggested to the gentleman, let it run until in the opinion of the gentleman in charge of this bill it may be necessary to make some motion for limiting the debate; and then the House can determine that question.

Mr. SPARKS. I would be regulated largely by the feeling of gentlemen on the other side upon this point. But would it not be well (I suggest it for the consideration of gentlemen) to fix now some limit to the length of speeches on this subject? Under the ordinary rules governing general debate every gentleman would be allowed to occupy an hour. But I apprehend that speeches of that length would not be desired on either side. Would it not be well, then, to fix now some limit as to the length of the speeches?

Mr. CONGER. I understand that there are perhaps two or three gentlemen who have prepared remarks on this subject and who perhaps would not wish to be limited by a ten-minute rule; but with the generality of members on this side I think the length of the speeches would not exceed ten minutes. I suggest, however, that the debate be permitted to run in its usual form and let those who may obtain the floor divide their time with other members. Hereafter, when the longer speeches on the question have been made, I have no doubt we can by agreement fix ten minutes or perhaps a shorter time as the limit for each speech.

Mr. SPARKS. One other point. Some gentlemen have inquired of me whether a vote would be taken to-day. I have not been able to answer the question. I want to give gentlemen an opportunity to discuss the subject fully. I would suggest that it be the understanding that no vote shall be taken prior to five o'clock to-day.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It seems to me it would be better to have it understood that no vote shall be taken to-day.

Mr. SPARKS. Very well; let that be the understanding.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I have no hope of being able to convey to the members of this House my own conviction of the very great gravity and solemnity of the crisis which this decision of the Chair and of the Committee of the Whole has brought upon this country. I wish I could be proved a false prophet in reference to the result of this action. I wish I could be overwhelmed with the proof that I am utterly mistaken in my views. But no view I have ever taken has entered more deeply and more seriously into my convictions than this: that this House has to-day resolved to enter upon a revolution against the Constitution and Government of the United States. I do not know that that intention exists in the minds of half the Representatives who occupy the other side of this Hall. I hope it does not. I am ready to believe it does not exist to any large extent. But I mean to say the consequence of the programme just adopted, if persisted in, is nothing less than the total subversion of this Government.

THE QUESTION STATED.

Let me in the outset state, as carefully as I may, the precise situation. At the last session, all our ordinary legislative work was done, in accordance with the usages of the House and the Senate, except as to two bills. Two of the twelve great appropriation bills for the support of the Government were agreed to in both Houses as to every matter of detail concerning the appropriations proper. We were assured by the committees of conference in both bodies that there would be no difficulty in adjusting all differences in reference to the amount of money to be appropriated and the objects of its appropriation. But the House of Representatives proposed three measures of distinctly independent legislation; one upon the Army appropriation bill, and two upon the legislative appropriation bill. The three grouped together are briefly these: first, the substantial modification of certain sections of the law relating to the use of the Army; second, the repeal of the jurors' test oath; and third, the repeal of the laws regulating elections of members of Congress.

These three propositions of legislation were insisted upon by the House, but the Senate refused to adopt them. So far it was an ordinary proceeding, one which occurs frequently in all legislative bodies. The Senate said to us through their conferees, "We are ready to pass the appropriation bills, but we are unwilling to pass as riders the three legislative measures you ask us to pass." Thereupon the House said, through its conference committee—and in order that I may do exact justice, I read from the speech of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] on the report of the conference committee:

The democratic conferees on the part of the House seem determined that unless those rights were secured to the people—

Alluding to the three points I have named—in the bill sent to the Senate they would refuse, under their constitutional right, to make appropriations to carry on the Government, if the dominant majority in the Senate insisted upon the maintenance of these laws and refused to consent to their repeal.

Then, after stating that if the position they had taken compelled an extra session, and that the new Congress would offer the repealing bills separately, and forecasting what would happen when the new House should be under no necessity of coercing the Senate, he declared that—

If, however, the President of the United States, in the exercise of the power vested in him, should see fit to veto the bills thus presented to him, * * * then I have no doubt those same amendments will be again made part of the appropriation bills, and it will be for the President to determine whether he will block the wheels of Government and refuse to accept necessary appropriations rather than allow the representatives of the people to repeal odious laws which they regard as subversive of their rights and privileges. * * * Whether that course is right or wrong, it will be adopted, and I have no doubt adhered to, no matter what happens with the appropriation bills.

That was the proposition made by the democracy in Congress at the close of the Congress now dead.

Another distinguished Senator, [Mr. THURMAN]—and I may properly refer to Senators of a Congress not now in existence—reviewing the situation, declared, in still more succinct terms:

We claim the right, which the House of Commons in England established after two centuries of contest, to say that we will not grant the money of the people unless there is a redress of grievances.

These propositions were repeated with various degrees of vehemence by the majority in the House.

The majority in the Senate and the minority on this floor expressed the deepest anxiety to avoid an extra session and to avert the catastrophe thus threatened—the stoppage of the Government. They pointed out the danger to the country and its business interests of an extra session of Congress, and expressed their willingness to consent to any compromise consistent with their views of duty which should be offered—not in the way of coercion but in the way of fair adjustment—and asked to be met in a spirit of just accommodation on the other side. Unfortunately no spirit of adjustment was manifested in reply to their advances. And now the new Congress is assembled; and after ten days of caucus deliberation, the House of Representatives has resolved, substantially, to reaffirm the positions of its predecessors, except that the suggestion of Senator BECK to offer the independent legislation in a separate bill has been abandoned. By a construction of the rules of the House, far more violent than any heretofore given, a part of this independent legislation is placed on the pending bill for the support of the Army; and this House has determined to begin its career by the extremest form of coercive legislation.

In my remarks to-day I shall confine myself almost exclusively to the one phase of the controversy presented in this bill.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the honorable gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. With pleasure.

Mr. ATKINS. Do I understand you to state that in the conference committee no proposition was made other than the one suggested in the legislation proposed to be attached to the bill, by the House conferees?

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not undertake to state what was done in conference except as reported by Senator BECK, for I was not a member of the committee.

Mr. ATKINS. I thought you did.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; I only declared what was proposed on the floor of the House and Senate.

Mr. ATKINS. With the gentleman's permission, I will state that the proposition the House made in conference committee was substantially the proposition now before the House and here offered to be attached to these bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. I take it for granted that what my friend on the other side says is strictly true; but not even that proposition was reported to either House.

The question, Mr. Chairman, may be asked, why make any special resistance to the clauses of legislation in this bill which a good many gentlemen on this side declared at the last session they cared but little about, and regarded as of very little practical importance, because for years there had been no actual use for any part of these laws, and they had no expectation there would be any? It may be asked, why make any controversy on either side? So far as we are concerned, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say this: we recognize the other side as accomplished parliamentarians and strategists, who have adopted with skill and adroitness their plan of assault. You have placed in the front one of the least objectionable of your measures; but your whole programme has been announced, and we reply to your whole order of battle. The logic of your position compels us to meet you as promptly on the skirmish line as afterward when our intrenchments are assailed; and therefore, at the outset, we plant our case upon the general ground upon which we have chosen to defend it.

THE VOLUNTARY POWERS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

And here, sir, I wish to make a brief digression, in which I hope no gentleman will consider my discussion as controversial or personal. I had occasion, at a late hour of the last Congress, to say something on what may be called the voluntary element in our institutions. I spoke of the distribution of the powers of Government. First, to the nation; second, to the States; and third, the reservation of power to the people themselves.

I called attention to the fact that under our form of government the most precious rights that men can possess on this earth are not delegated to the nation nor to the States, but are reserved to the third estate—the people themselves. I called attention to the interesting fact that lately the chancellor of the German Empire made the declaration that it was the chief object of the existence of the German government to defend and maintain the religion of Jesus Christ—an object in reference to which our Congress is absolutely forbidden by the Constitution to legislate at all. Congress can establish no religion; indeed, can make no law respecting it, because in the view of our fathers—the founders of our Government—religion was too precious a right to intrust its interests by delegation to any body. Its maintenance was left to the voluntary action of the people themselves.

In continuation of that thought, I wish now to speak of the voluntary element inside our Government—a topic that I have not often heard discussed, but one which appears to me of vital importance in any comprehensive view of our institutions.

Mr. Chairman, viewed from the stand-point of a foreigner, our Government may be said to be the feeblest on the earth. From our stand-point, and with our experience, it is the mightiest. But why would a foreigner call it the feeblest? He can point out a half dozen ways in which it can be destroyed without violence. Of course, all governments may be overturned by the sword; but there are several ways in which our Government may be annihilated without the firing of a gun.

For example, if the people of the United States should say we will elect no Representatives to the House of Representatives. Of course, this is a violent supposition; but suppose that they do not, is there any remedy? Does our Constitution provide any remedy whatever? In two years there would be no House of Representatives; of course no support of the Government, and no Government. Suppose, again, the States should say, through their Legislatures, we will elect no Senators. Such abstention alone would absolutely destroy this Government; and our system provides no process of compulsion to prevent it.

Again, suppose the two Houses were assembled in their usual order, and a majority of one in this body or in the Senate should firmly band themselves together and say, we will vote to adjourn the moment the hour of meeting arrives, and continue so to vote at every session during our two years of existence; the Government would perish, and there is no provision of the Constitution to prevent it. Or again, if a majority of one of either body should declare that they would vote down, and did vote down, every bill to support the Government by appropriations, can you find in the whole range of our judicial or our executive authority any remedy whatever? A Senator, or a member of this House is free, and may vote "no" on every proposition. Nothing but his oath and his honor restrains him. Not so with executive and judicial officers. They have no power to destroy this Government. Let them travel an inch beyond the line of the law, and they fall within the power of impeachment. But, against the people who create Representatives; against the Legislatures who create Senators; against Senators and Representatives in these Halls, there is no power of impeachment; there is no remedy, if, by abstention or by adverse votes, they refuse to support the Government.

At a first view, it would seem strange that a body of men so wise as our fathers were should have left a whole side of their fabric open to these deadly assaults; but on a closer view of the case their wisdom will appear. What was their reliance? This: the sovereign of this nation, the God-crowned and Heaven-annointed sovereign, in whom resides "the State's collected will," and to whom we all owe allegiance, is the people themselves. Inspired by love of country and by a deep sense of obligation to perform every public duty; being themselves the creators of all the agencies and forces to execute their own will, and choosing from themselves their representatives to express that will in the forms of law, it would have been like a suggestion of suicide to assume that any of these great voluntary powers would be turned against the life of the Government. Public opinion—that great ocean of thought from whose level all heights and all depths are measured—was trusted as a power amply able, and always willing, to guard all the approaches on that side of the Constitution from any assault on the life of the nation.

Up to this hour our sovereign has never failed us. There has never been such a refusal to exercise those primary functions of sovereignty as either to endanger or cripple the Government; nor have the majority of the representatives of that sovereign in either House of Congress ever before announced their purpose to use their voluntary powers for its destruction. And now, for the first time in our history, and I will add for the first time for at least two centuries in the history of any English-speaking nation, it is proposed and insisted upon that these voluntary powers shall be used for the destruction of the Government. I want it distinctly understood that the proposition which I read at the beginning of my remarks, and which is the programme announced to the American people to-day, is this: that if this House cannot have its own way in certain matters, not connected with appropriations, it will so use, or refrain from using, its voluntary powers as to destroy the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been said on the other side that when a demand for the redress of grievances is made, the authority that runs the risk of stopping and destroying the Government is the one that resists the redress. Not so. If gentlemen will do me the honor to follow my thought for a moment more I trust I will make this denial good.

FREE CONSENT THE BASIS OF OUR LAWS.

Our theory of law is free consent. That is the granite foundation of our whole superstructure. Nothing in this Republic can be law without consent—the free consent of the House; the free consent of the Senate; the free consent of the Executive, or, if he refuse it, the free consent of two-thirds of these bodies. Will any man deny that? Will any man challenge a line of the statement that free consent is the foundation rock of all our institutions? And yet the programme announced two weeks ago was that if the Senate refused to consent to the demand of the House the Government should stop. And the proposition was then, and the programme is now, that, although there is not a Senate to be coerced, there is still a third independent branch in the legislative power of the Government whose consent is to be coerced at the peril of the destruction of this Government; that is, if the President, in the discharge of his duty, shall exercise his plain constitutional right to refuse his consent to this proposed legislation the Congress will so use its voluntary powers as to destroy the Government. This is the proposition which we confront; and we denounce it as revolution.

It makes no difference, Mr. Chairman, what the issue is. If it were the simplest and most inoffensive proposition in the world, yet if you demand, as a matter of coercion, that it shall be adopted against the free consent prescribed in the Constitution, every fair-minded man in America is bound to resist you as much as though his own life depended upon his resistance.

Let it be understood that I am not arguing the merits of any one of the three amendments. I am discussing the proposed method of legislation; and I declare that it is against the Constitution of our country. It is revolutionary to the core, and is destructive of the fundamental element of American liberty, the free consent of all the powers that unite to make laws.

In opening this debate I challenge all comers to show a single instance in our history where this consent has been coerced. This is the great, the paramount issue, which dwarfs all others into insignificance.

THE ORIGIN OF THE LAW SOUGHT TO BE MODIFIED.

I now turn aside for a moment from the line of my argument to say that it is not a little surprising that our friends on the other side should have gone into this great contest on so weak a cause as the one embraced in the pending amendment to this bill.

Victor Hugo said in his description of the battle of Waterloo that the struggle of the two armies was like the wrestling of two giants, when a chip under the heel of one might determine the victory. It may be that this amendment is the chip under your heel, or it may be that it is the chip on our shoulder. As a chip, it is of small account to you or to us; but when it represents the integrity of the Constitution and is assailed by revolution, we fight for it as if it were a Kohinoor of purest water. [Applause.]

The distinguished and venerable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] spoke of this law, which is sought to be repealed, as "odious and dangerous." It has been denounced as a piece of partisan war legislation to enable the Army to control elections.

Do gentlemen know its history? Do they know whereof they affirm? Who made this law which is denounced as so great an offense as to justify the destruction of the Government rather than let it remain on the statute-book? Its first draft was introduced into the Senate by a prominent democrat from the State of Kentucky, Mr. Powell, who made an able speech in its favor. It was reported against by a republican committee of that body, whose printed report I hold in my hand. It encountered weeks of debate, was amended and passed, and then came into the House. Every democrat present in the Senate voted for it on its final passage. Every Senator who voted against it was a republican. No democrat voted against it. Who were the democrats that voted for it? Let me read some of the names: Hendricks of Indiana, Davis of Kentucky, Johnson of Maryland, McDougall of California, Powell of Kentucky, Richardson of Illinois, and Saulsbury of Delaware.

Of republican Senators thirteen voted against it; only ten voted for it.

The bill then came to the House of Representatives and was put upon its passage here. How did the vote stand in this body? Every democrat present at the time in the House of Representatives of the Thirty-eighth Congress voted for it. The total vote in its favor in the House was 113; and of these 58 were democrats. And who were they? The magnates of the party. The distinguished Speaker of this House, Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, voted for it. The distinguished chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the last House, Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, voted for it. The distinguished member from my own State who now holds a seat in the other end of the Capitol, Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON, voted for it. Messrs. COX and COFFROTH, KERNAN and MORRISON, who are still in Congress, voted for it. Every democrat of conspicuous name and fame in that House voted for the bill, and not one against it. There were but few republicans who voted against it. I was one of the few. Thaddeus Stevens and Judge KELLEY voted against it.

What was the controversy? What was the object of the bill? It was alleged by democrats that in those days of war there were interferences with the proper freedom of elections in the border States. We denied the charge; but lest there might be some infraction of the freedom of elections, many republicans, unwilling that there should be even the semblance of interference with that freedom, voted for it. This law is an expression of their purpose that the Army should not be used at any election except for the purpose of keeping the peace.

Those republicans who voted against it did so on the ground that there was no cause for such legislation; that it was a slander upon the Government and the Army to say that they were interfering with the proper freedom of elections. I was among that number——

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. CARLISLE. I ask if the democrats in the Senate and House of Representatives did not vote for that proposition because it came in the form of a substitute for another proposition that was still more objectionable?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman is quite mistaken. The original bill was introduced by a gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Powell; it was amended in its course through the Senate; but the votes to which I have referred were the final votes on its passage after all the amendments had been made; and, what was more, a republican Senator moved to reconsider it, hoping that they might thereby kill it. And after several days' delay and debate it was again passed, every democrat again voting for it. In the House there was no debate, and therefore no expression of the reasons why anybody voted for it. Each man voted according to his convictions, I suppose.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the venerable gentleman from Georgia for a question.

Mr. STEPHENS. I simply ask if the country is likely to be revolutionized and the Government destroyed by repealing a law that the gentleman himself voted against? [Laughter on the democratic side.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I think not. That is not the element of revolution, as I will show the gentleman. The proposition now is, that after fourteen years have passed, and not one petition from one American citizen has come to us asking that this law be repealed; while not one memorial has found its way to our desks complaining of the law, so far as I have heard, the democratic House of Representatives now holds that if they are not permitted to force upon another House and upon the Executive against their consent the repeal of a law that democrats made, this refusal shall be considered a sufficient ground for starving this Government to death. That is the proposition which we denounce as revolution. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Before he leaves that part of his remarks to which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] has referred, I desire to ask the gentleman whether he wishes to make the impression upon the House that the bill introduced by Senator Powell, of Kentucky, and which resulted finally in the law of 1865, was the bill that passed the Senate, that passed the House, and for which he says the present Speaker of this House and myself voted?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have not intimated that there were no amendments. On the contrary I have said that it was amended in the Senate. One amendment permitted the use of the Army to repel armed enemies of the United States from the polls.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. So far as I am personally concerned, I deny that I ever voted for a bill except as a substitute for a more pernicious and objectionable measure. [Much laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. GARFIELD. What I have said is a matter of record. And I say again the gentleman voted for this law, that every democrat in the Senate and in the House who voted at all voted for this law just as it now stands, and without their votes it could not have passed. No amendments whatever were offered in the House, and there was no other bill on the subject before the House.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to submit another question to my friend.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It is whether, in 1865, at the time of the passage of this law, when the war had not really subsided, whether there was not in a portion of this country a condition of things rendering it almost impossible to exercise the elective franchise unless there was some degree of military interference. [Great laughter.] And further, whether, after the experience of fourteen years since the war has subsided, that gentleman is yet prepared to continue a war measure in a time of profound peace in this country?

Mr. GARFIELD. No doubt the patriotic gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] took all these things into consideration when he voted for this law; and I may have been unpatriotic in voting against it at that time; but he and I must stand by our records, as they were made.

Let it be understood that I am not discussing the merits of this law. I have merely turned aside from the line of my argument to show the inconsistency of the other side in proposing to stop the Government if they cannot force the repeal of a law which they themselves made. I am discussing a method of revolution against the Constitution now proposed by this House, and to that issue I hold gentlemen in this debate, and challenge them to reply.

And now, before I close, I ask the forbearance of gentlemen on the other side while I offer a suggestion which I make with reluctance. They will bear me witness that I have in many ways shown my desire that the wounds of the war should be healed; that the grass which has grown green over the graves of the dead of both armies might symbolize the returning spring of friendship and peace between citizens who were lately in arms against each other.

But I am compelled by the necessities of the case to refer to a chapter of our recent history. The last act of democratic domination in this Capitol, eighteen years ago, was striking and dramatic, perhaps heroic. Then the democratic party said to the republicans, "If you elect the man of your choice as President of the United States we will shoot your Government to death;" and the people of this country, refusing to be coerced by threats or violence, voted as they pleased, and lawfully elected Abraham Lincoln as President of the United States.

Then your leaders, though holding a majority in the other branch of Congress, were heroic enough to withdraw from their seats and fling down the gage of mortal battle. We called it rebellion; but we recognized it as courageous and manly to avow your purpose, take all the risks, and fight it out in the open field. Notwithstanding your utmost efforts to destroy it, the Government was saved. Year by year since the war ended those who resisted you have come to believe that you have finally renounced your purpose to destroy and are willing to maintain the Government. In that belief you have been permitted to return to power in the two Houses.

To-day, after eighteen years of defeat, the book of your domination is again opened, and your first act awakens every unhappy memory and threatens to destroy the confidence which your professions of patriotism inspired. You turned down a leaf of the history that recorded your last act of power in 1861, and you have now signalized your return to power by beginning a second chapter at the same page; not this time by a heroic act that declares war on the battle-field, but you say if all the legislative powers of the Government do not consent to let you tear certain laws out of the statute-book you will not shoot our Government to death as you tried to do in the first chapter, but you declare that if we do not consent against our will, if you cannot coerce an independent branch of this Government, against its will, to allow you to tear from the statute-books some laws put there by the will of the people, you will starve the Government to death. [Great applause on the republican side.]

Between death on the field and death by starvation, I do not know that the American people will see any great difference. The end, if successfully reached, would be death in either case. Gentlemen, you have it in your power to kill this Government; you have it in your power, by withholding these two bills, to smite the nerve-centers of our Constitution with the paralysis of death; and you have declared your purpose to do this, if you cannot break down that fundamental element of free consent which up to this hour has always ruled in the legislation of this Government.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the refusal to permit the Army at the polls will be the death of this Government? [Derisive cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" on the republican side.] That is the logic of the gentleman's argument, if it means anything. But we say that it will be the preservation of this Government to keep the military power from destroying liberty at the polls.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have too much respect for the intellect of the gentleman from North Carolina to believe that he thinks that is my argument. He does not say he thinks so. On the contrary, I am sure that every clear-minded man on this floor knows that such is not my argument. The position on the other side is simply this: that unless some independent branch of the legislative power of this Government is forced against its will to vote for or to approve of what it does not freely consent to, you will use the voluntary power in your hands to starve the Government to death.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him another question? Do I understand him to assume that we are forcing some branch of the Government to do what it does not wish to do? How do we know that, or how does the gentleman know it? Does the gentleman, when he speaks of "the Government," mean to say that it is not the Government of the majority, or does he assume that the majority is on his side?

Mr. GARFIELD. I am perfectly protected against the suggestion of the gentleman. I read in the outset declarations of leading members of his party in both branches of Congress asserting this programme and declaring the intention of carrying it through to the end, in spite of the Senate and in spite of an executive veto, which they anticipate. The method here proposed invites, possibly compels, a veto.

COERCION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Touching this question of executive action, I remind the gentlemen that in 1856 the national democratic convention, in session at Cincinnati, and still later, the national democratic convention of 1860, affirmed the right of the veto as one of the sacred rights guaranteed by our Government. Here is the resolution:

> That we are decidedly opposed to taking from the President the qualified veto power by which he is enabled, under restrictions and responsibilities amply sufficient to guard the public interests, to suspend the passage of a bill whose merits cannot secure the approval of two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives until the judgment of the people can be obtained thereon.

The doctrine is that any measure which cannot be passed over a veto by a two-third vote has no right to become a law, and the only mode of redress is an appeal to the people at the next election. That has been the democratic doctrine from the earliest days, notably so from Jackson's time, until now.

In leaving this topic, let me ask what would you have said if, in 1861, the democratic members of the Senate, being then a majority of that body, instead of taking the heroic course and going out to battle, had simply said, "We will put on an appropriation bill an amendment declaring the right of any State to secede from the Union at pleasure, and forbidding the President or any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States from interfering with any State in its work of secession." Suppose they had said to the President, "Unless you consent to the incorporation of this provision in an appropriation bill we will refuse supplies to the Government." Perhaps they could then have killed the Government by starvation; but even in the madness of that hour the leaders of rebellion did not think it worthy their manhood to put their fight on that dishonorable ground. They planted themselves on the higher plane of battle and fought it out to defeat.

Now, by a method which the wildest secessionist scorned to adopt, it is proposed to make this new assault upon the life of the Republic.

Gentlemen, we have calmly surveyed this new field of conflict; we have tried to count the cost of the struggle, as we did that of 1861 before we took up your gage of battle. Though no human foresight could forecast the awful loss of blood and treasure, yet in the name of liberty and union we accepted the issue and fought it out to the end. We made the appeal to our august sovereign, to the omnipotent public opinion of America, to determine whether the Union should perish at your hands. You know the result. And now lawfully, in the exercise of our right as Representatives, we take up the gage you have this day thrown down, and appeal again to our common sovereign to determine whether you shall be permitted to destroy the principle of free consent in legislation under the threat of starving the Government to death.

We are ready to pass these bills for the support of the Government at any hour when you will offer them in the ordinary way, by the methods prescribed by the Constitution. If you offer those other propositions of legislation as separate measures we will meet you in the fraternal spirit of fair debate and will discuss their merits. Some of your measures many of us will vote for in separate bills. But you shall not coerce any independent branch of this Government, even by the threat of starvation, to consent to surrender its voluntary powers until the question has been appealed to the sovereign and decided in your favor. On this ground we plant ourselves, and here we will stand to the end.

PROTECTION OF THE NATIONAL BALLOT-BOX REFUSED.

Let it be remembered that the avowed object of this new revolution is to destroy all the defenses which the nation has placed around its ballot-box to guard the fountain of its own life. You say that the United States shall not employ even its civil power to keep peace at the polls. You say that the marshals shall have no power either to arrest rioters or criminals who seek to destroy the freedom and purity of the ballot-box.

I remind you that you have not always shown this great zeal in keeping the civil officers of the General Government out of the States. Only six years before the war your law authorized marshals of the United States to enter all our hamlets and households to hunt for fugitive slaves. Not only that, it empowered the marshals to summon the posse comitatus, to command all bystanders to join in the chase and aid in remanding to eternal bondage the fleeing slave. And your democratic Attorney-General, in his opinion published in 1854, declared that the marshal of the United States might summon to his aid the whole able-bodied force of his precinct, not only including bystanders and other citizens generally, "but any and all organized armed forces, whether militia of the State, or officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of the United States," to join in the chase and hunt down the fugitive. Now, gentlemen, if, for the purpose of making eternal slavery the lot of an American, you could send your marshals, summon your posse, and use the armed force of the United States, with what face or grace can you tell us that this Government cannot lawfully employ the same marshals with their armed posse, if need be, to maintain the purity of our own elections and keep the peace at our own polls. You have made the issue and we have accepted it. In the name of the Constitution and on behalf of good government and public justice, we make the appeal to our common sovereign.

For the present I refrain from discussing the merits of the election laws. I have sought only to state the first fundamental ground of our opposition to this revolutionary method of legislation by coercion. [Great applause.]

Mr. SPARKS. Before the gentleman from Ohio takes his seat I hope he will give to the House the name of the Attorney-General of the United States to whom he referred.

Mr. GARFIELD. I refer to Caleb Cushing, the democratic Attorney-General of President Pierce.

Mr. SPARKS. Precisely; we only wanted to know the name which the gentleman did not give before.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. Chairman, I have heard gentlemen on the other side take every opportunity that offered during the last four years to read a lecture to gentlemen from the South on this side of the House upon their past and present conduct. We find these lectures repeated in the partisan press of the party to which the gentlemen belong. I want to know, sir, where the gentlemen on that side receive their authority to hold over their southern colleagues the threat that the war is not yet over, the North not yet pacified; and that somebody may yet deal with our friends from the South as naughty men whose crimes have not been forgotten or forgiven. If southern men ought not to be admitted to the full, free, and equal interchange and expression of opinion, with the absolute right to vote upon this and all other questions, as their judgment dictates, then, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, the war for the Union has proved a failure; then all that was predicted of the attempt to restore this Union by force, by those who were opposed to the war in the North, has been, or soon will be, realized to its fullest extent.

What was the purpose of the war? What the meaning of the many proclamations to the people of the North and South that its only object was the restoration of the Union?

And now, after the lapse of fourteen years from the firing of the last gun, when the Union is, or ought to be, fully restored, and peace is supposed to be reigning over the whole land, southern Representatives cannot exercise an intelligent judgment upon a vital and fundamental question of free government without being called to an account. I deny to gentlemen on the other side, in all common decency, the right to hold over these gentlemen the unmanly threat of my colleague from Ohio, that their conduct is revolutionary, and is similar in its purposes and intents to the action of their predecessors in the years 1860 and 1861. In 1861 the intent of the southern men was to break up the Union. In 1879 the democratic party is contending for the corner-stone of free government—the freedom of the polls from the interference of the regular soldier. When southern men range themselves under our banner, how do they violate their duty as Representatives? Why shall they be assaulted as untrue to the Union? Does loyalty consist in an attachment to the decaying body of the republican party?

And when my friend from Ohio says that in 1860 it would have been competent for the southern majority in the Senate to have annexed to an appropriation bill certain propositions favorable to secession, as we propose to annex certain repeals now, he forgets that the very theory upon which those gentlemen retired from the Senate of the United States, followed by their Representatives upon the floor of this House, was that after their States had passed the several acts of secession they had no right upon the floor of the Senate or House, and could give no vote.

But we are now all united. Every State has its Representatives; and I hope they come here to represent their people. I believe that all desire to perform their whole duty to the people and to the country at large. And certainly in my experience in Congress, and I wish the people could have enjoyed the same opportunity to observe, the southern men have shown far more disposition to manifest their thorough reconstruction than northern republicans have shown willingness for harmony between the sections. And the reason is simple. As the republican party gained power through the excitement of war, it dreads dissolution upon the return of permanent peace. In my judgment, the thorough pacification of this country and the retirement of the republican party from power will be, and must be, contemporaneous events. If the people desire to bury sectional animosities they must put down the party which lives upon them. If they hope to turn the attention of law-makers to other subjects than the worn-out issues of the war, the people of the North must send to the rear the politicians who are seeking to tear open the wounds of the late struggle. Under republican rule the war was brought to a successful end; but reconciliation they are unable and unwilling to promote. The speech of my colleague from Ohio is signal proof of this fact. In insinuation and open charge it was only one of the many red flags held out to provoke sectional controversy and stir up animosity.

I would ask my colleague from the State of Ohio, who constituted him the guardian of the southern men on this floor? Who gave him the right to read them lectures, as if they were his subordinates and not his equals upon this floor? Does the gentleman assume to speak for the people of the North? He ought to have remembered the fact that his party is no longer in the majority. He ought to have recollected that between its southern policy and its financial management republicanism has been shorn of many hundred thousands of its followers. And when he insists that southern men shall be guided by republican ideas as the price of the good opinion of republican leaders, I would ask him what are they to follow? Shall they adopt the gentleman's teaching at the present time, or may they not adopt his practices in the past, when so many laws were enacted upon appropriation bills by him and his party?

And I want to say to gentlemen on the other side who talk as if they held this country in a sling and carried the Government around in their breeches pocket—I want them to know and to realize that in the last presidential election they were in a minority of over one million of the white voters of this country, and in a minority of over two hundred and fifty thousand of its whole voting population. If we look at the figures of the last general election, I want them to know and to realize the fact, for the figures show it, that they are in a most overwhelming minority, if I may use the expression, and they no longer represent the people of this country, North or South. They have a President in power, it is true, but we all know how he was put there. We all know he received neither a majority of the votes of the people, nor did he receive a legal majority of the electoral votes. We are here, sir, on this side representing the people, and in the other House we represent the people as well. If there had been fair play we would have had all the departments of the Government. Representing as we do the majority of the people of this country, we propose to exercise all the powers of legislation as men fully sensible of the responsibility resting upon us. The people have trusted us, and we are here to protect their rights, and he is no true Representative who will allow his judgment to be influenced by the line of argument adopted by my colleague from Ohio.

And this brings me, Mr. Chairman, to the discussion of the particular question now before us. Having under consideration the bill for the support of the Army, we propose to amend section 2002 of the Revised Statutes so that it will read as follows:

No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States.

The section, as it now stands, has at the end of it, "or to keep the peace at the polls." So the only change proposed by us is to strike out the words permitting troops or armed men of the United States to "keep the peace at the polls." The presence of regular troops at the polls is so obnoxious to the American citizen that I am surprised that gentlemen upon the other side do not concede our amendment at once. The course of my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] is certainly extraordinary. He is unwilling to discuss the merits of the proposition. He will not say that our proposed amendment is not right. He admits that he voted against this section when it became a law, but he gives us no light about his present views. Surely, when so distinguished and intelligent a gentleman arraigns a large number of his colleagues as revolutionists because of their support of this measure, he ought to deign to give us an opinion as to whether, in his judgment, it is right or wrong. Does his party seek to evade this discussion and to find refuge under the worn-out "bloody shirt?"

Another remarkable circumstance in my colleague's argument is his statement that when the law, as it now stands, was passed, it received every democratic vote in the House and Senate. He has not given us the true spirit of the record upon this subject. In 1865 the democratic party was in a distressing minority both in the House and Senate. It could enact no laws without republican consent. It voted for this bill because it had no other choice. Great evils existed in all the border and some of the Southern States as to interference in elections by Federal officers and soldiers. To correct these evils Mr. Powell introduced a bill, to which the gentleman has referred. I think my colleague will find, if he will consult the record of proceedings in the Senate, that upon the motion of a republican Senator the words we now propose to strike out were added by republican votes against democratic protests. And in the House, under the previous question, no amendment was possible.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD rose.

Mr. McMAHON. I prefer not to yield to the gentleman now, but will give him after a while all the time I have left.

Gentlemen upon the other side forget that during the war, when it was popular, not only in their party, but with the people, to augment the executive power of the Government for the purpose of enabling us to put down the rebellion, almost every conceivable outrage was perpetrated upon the liberty of the people at the polls, under the so-called war power, the avowed pretext being to preserve the peace, but the real object being to secure a majority on the floor of this House and otherwise to control the elections in the various border States.

It is an old maxim, full of wisdom, that "a half loaf is better than no bread." This law did not meet the views of the democratic members of either body; but it was better than no law. It was a step in the proper direction, and they trusted to the future, when the Union would be fully restored, to return to its proper channels the overgrown power of the executive branch of our Government.

But gentlemen on the other side plant themselves upon the position that we have no right to attach this measure to an appropriation bill. Why not? We are acting under the rules of the House and in strict accord with general parliamentary law. We have a right to put it there if we have the majority, and I would wish to recall to the gentleman's short memory the fact that he and his party have resorted to this method of enforcing their views upon many important occasions. It came into existence at an early day as one of the means by which the people of England saved themselves from tyrannical kings; and it is a power which we should never abandon under any circumstances, no matter how free our Government may seem to be at the present time. When our fathers conferred upon Congress the right to "raise and support armies," they intended to give Congress the absolute power to determine for what purposes these armies should be used.

If this was the first time this power had been exercised by either party, I would not be so surprised to hear our action denounced as "revolutionary." But it has been freely used in the past by the republican party. And in the last two Houses all the economy, and it was great, which the democratic House was able to accomplish, it achieved by constant legislation upon the various appropriation bills presented to it.

Gentlemen assume that we are coercing somebody, some co-ordinate branch of the Government. By what right do they say so? How can we tell, or what difference ought it to make to us, what view the Senate or the President may take of this question? They may be as eager as we for this reform. As it is correct in principle, we have the right to suppose that it will be welcomed in any shape. Does the gentleman from Ohio speak with any authority when he assumes that our action will not receive the sanction of the President. I will not believe, and do not, that the President has been guilty of so gross a violation of the proprieties of the occasion.

Now I am not in favor of constant general legislation upon appropriation bills. But when we are voting money to support an Army for the next fiscal year, have we not the right, and is it not our duty, to say emphatically that these soldiers shall not be used for the purpose of intimidating voters or influencing the election? If the President of the United States can convince the country that we have no right to pass such a law, under any circumstances, because it invades his constitutional right as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, the country would sustain him in refusing his assent to the bill. But if his assent is withheld because he does not approve of the measure or of the manner in which it has been passed, the people will not approve of his action. The veto power was not given to the President, in my judgment, to make him a constant actor in legislation, but as a defensive or protective power, to prevent the invasion of the constitutional right of the other departments, or, in extreme cases, the passage of hasty and ill-advised legislation. I do not agree with my colleague in his statement that the President is a part and parcel of the legislative power of this country. He has become so, in practice, to a certain extent, but I believe the practice is wrong.

When I turn to the very first article of the Constitution, which speaks about the legislative power of the Government, I find it says:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

It does not say it shall consist of a House and Senate and President of the United States. On the contrary, it says simply "a Senate and House of Representatives." When I then turn to that article of the Constitution which provides for the executive power I find it says:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America.

Therefore I say, Mr. Chairman, that when certain vital measures concerning the purity and the freedom of elections are involved; when the question as to whether the people shall ever have the power, under the Constitution and under the laws, to rid themselves of a party in power which was not properly placed there, or whose policy makes it desirable that it should be turned out; when it comes to the vital question as to whether the people shall be permitted to have a fair opportunity to determine at the ballot-box who shall be their rulers, their representatives have a right to put upon any appropriation bill these measures, and say, "We want the jury-box pure and uncontaminated; we do not want the United States courts used as the machinery of a political party to intimidate whole sections of the country by political prosecutions with partisan juries for alleged election offenses, thereby keeping one party in power; we do not want the President of the United States, under his pretended right as Commander-in-Chief, to move the troops to the polls to deter men from coming there to vote the opposite ticket, and we do not intend that it shall lie in the power of the marshals of the United States, the mere creatures of the President, to appoint any number of irresponsible and corrupt men to stand at the polls and to intimidate the honest voter in his exercise of the elective franchise."

These are measures upon which we stand. The gentleman has truly said that we have well weighed and considered them. We regard them all as vital. They concern the very foundation of free government, the right of the people to express an untrammeled will through the ballot-box, free from violence, corruption, and, above all, Federal interference. I believe that we have made up our minds fully to take all the consequences before the people of an adherence to our views. If the President of the United States prefers to "starve the Government," because the stalwarts of his party demand that he shall assist in raising the "bloody flag" once more, with him will rest the responsibility. If the party in power is determined to perpetuate itself in power by the retention, at all hazards, of all the political machinery by which they have hitherto suppressed the will of the people, and corrupted elections, the battle for an honest jury, the proper administration of justice, the purity and freedom of elections cannot begin too soon. The cry of the professional politician will not deceive the people. The appeal to war feelings will be laughed to scorn. A suffering nation wants peace, quiet, harmony, and relief from the burdens of taxation; and it no longer demands or desires the harassing legislation of the party in power.

Now, is the measure we are considering right and constitutional? This is the particular proposition which I propose to discuss at the present time. I could not follow, if I wished, my colleague in his eloquent and rambling discourse. I did not obtain the floor for that purpose. He has refused to discuss the merits of this question. I desire to discuss them. He indulged in a number of high-sounding phrases of a general character of which only the application was wrong. While he, as the leader upon that side, expressed his confidence in the people of the United States, I must be permitted to say that the statute-book is full of villainous laws which his party enacted, based on the idea that the people are without honest intelligence, full of depravity, ignorance, and corruption. A government of the people cannot last long if such be the fact.

Some of these laws we propose to repeal at the present time; others we propose to repeal at a future day, which, thank God! is not far distant. Then a greater "revolution" than the present will take place. Some gentlemen upon the other side seem to think that a "revolution" is always going on when some republican official is about to be put out of office. [Laughter and applause.] The Government is always in danger unless in the hands of republican office-holders, and it is treason and disloyalty to pull down any machinery designed to perpetuate their exclusive reign!

Does the measure proposed infringe upon the constitutional right of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army? And what are the respective powers of Congress and the President in regard to the Army and Navy? These are vital questions, and their exceeding importance is my apology for claiming the attention of the House to-day.

The country is under great obligations to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] who made so able an exposition yesterday of the extent of the right of the President to interfere, with the Federal troops, in the affairs of a State. It is the duty of every Representative to put himself on record against the wild claims for executive power put forward by gentlemen upon the other side, lest acquiescence in them may be presumed, and be cited as precedent at some distant day. I desire to speak more particularly as to the power of the President over the Army, in connection with the powers of Congress.

I was surprised to hear the able gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] say that, even if we should pass this law, we would not thereby interfere with the President's power; that, as Commander-in-Chief, he would still possess the power to move the troops wherever he pleased; that he could take them from the Indian frontier and place them in New York, or order them from Galveston to a fort in Maine. If by this remark he only meant that, in the absence of any law, the President could exercise these powers, I make no objection. But the gentleman seemed to insist that he could do these things in spite of law; for he argued that if we passed the measure the President could yet transport troops where he pleased, and that our law would not reduce expenditures, because it would not control the President in his movements of the troops. Such a claim has been made in this House within my recollection more than once. Gentlemen who make it do not derive their ideas from the true sources of knowledge, the patriotic sources; they do not find such teachings in the writings of the fathers. They derive their inspiration from the improper action of their own party in the days when it was popular, as I have said, and may have been necessary temporarily to permit the exercise of power by the Executive which it did not possess under the Constitution. Let us examine the constitutional provisions as to the powers of Congress and the executive department.

In the Constitution of the United States we find that Congress has the following powers, (article 1, section 8:)

11. To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;

12. To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years;

13. To provide and maintain a navy;

14. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces;

15. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions;

16. To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States,

* * * * * * *

18. To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

The powers of the President are conferred only in general terms in the following language:

The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States.—Article 2, sec. 1.

He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.—Article 2, sec. 3.

It will be seen that the whole power of declaring war, raising as well as supporting armies, providing and maintaining navies, organizing, arming, and governing the militia, and, above all, of making rules and regulations for the land and naval forces, and for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppressing insurrection, and repelling invasion, is confided in Congress—the representatives of the people. The President is the Commander-in-Chief of the land and naval forces and the militia when called into service; but, in the language of Alexander Hamilton, he is only the first general and the first admiral in the United States. Does that make him the first general in the land over the law or under the law? Clearly, he is only the first general under the law; and I was glad to hear my distinguished friend from Maryland [Mr. MCLANE] putting in a protest yesterday, in the very opening of this discussion, against the claims of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Congress, having power to raise and support an army, may refuse to raise an army at all; or Congress may say that it will only have such an army as is necessary to maintain the peace on the Indian frontier. It may pass a law that ten regiments of cavalry shall constitute the entire standing Army of the United States, to be stationed and used only upon the Indian frontier. Such a statute might not be a sensible one, but suppose it should be passed: does the gentleman from Maine contend that the President of the United States would have the right to withdraw these troops from the Indian frontier to the coast of Maine, or send them to harry the people of Louisiana or South Carolina on election day to perpetuate his party in power? I believe his party would act upon the theory that such a right exists.

I will put another case: suppose that at the instance of the Representatives from the State of New York we should enact a law ordering the construction of ten monitors or torpedo-boats, and should say by law that they should be used for the defense of New York harbor, and should be used for no other purpose, should be transported to no other point: what would we say if the President of the United States, under some public exigency, as he claimed, should remove those monitors to some southern port? I know the argument would be put forward, if the gentlemen on the other side of the House were in power, that if a public exigency, or an exigency of their party, which to them are but synonymous terms, should arise, they would say that the "life of the nation" was in danger, and their President would do it; but they would probably come to Congress after a while for a bill of indemnity, as they did for a great many things done in past days by the President, Secretary of War, and other people in power. But this is of itself a concession that the law of Congress was right and had been broken without authority.

I maintain, therefore, that the whole subject of raising, providing, maintaining, and supporting an army and a navy is within the legitimate powers of Congress; that the purposes for which they are raised or provided may be lawfully stated in the statute; that their uses for certain purposes, for example the maintenance of peace at the polls or use as a posse comitatus, may be denied. When such troops or naval forces have been constituted, I do not deny that the President is the commander. But he is commander only under the law. Through him orders are conveyed. By him movements, not forbidden by statute, may be made at his pleasure. But if he can violate the statute, he is higher than the Constitution, and becomes at once our king, emperor, dictator, or what you will.

This clause does not interfere, therefore, with the constitutional power of the President as Commander-in-Chief of the Army. Does it interfere with any other clause of the Constitution? The argument is made that it limits the power of the President under article 4, section 4, of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

My friend from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] made it very clear the other day that under this section the President has no power; that whatever power he possesses to-day is vested in him by virtue of a law of Congress, section 5297; and that what Congress had granted, it could as readily take away, limit, or qualify. The President is not the "United States," to whom is confided the powers and duties mentioned in section 4, article 4, of the Constitution.

Nor is the law, as we propose to pass it, in conflict with the duties we have imposed upon the President in section 5297. The President is not authorized under that section to send troops into a State for the purpose of "preserving the peace at the polls." His powers are limited not only by the law, but by the Constitution. No interference is permitted in the domestic affairs of a State, where Federal laws are not concerned, except upon the application of the Legislature, or the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened. Where Federal laws are concerned and their execution is involved the rule is different; and I shall presently refer to the distinction. If the very improbable case put by the gentleman from New Jersey should arise, in which the President was properly called upon to suppress insurrection against the authority of a State, his officers, if acting under his orders, would not be liable under the law as we propose to pass it. The two laws would be construed together; and if the troops were lawfully there under the Constitution and laws under one section, their officers would not and could not be prosecuted under the other.

My colleague from Ohio, not the gentleman whom I am just now following in the course of debate, but my other colleague from the Springfield district, [Mr. KEIFER,] made the proposition that the officers of the Army and Navy and the marshals of the United States are conservators of the peace upon all occasions in the States. And from that he argued that it was right to have troops at the polls. I scarcely believed such an extraordinary proposition could be seriously made. When I heard the gentleman make it I thought I did not correctly understand him, but when I read the RECORD to see what he did say I find it there substantially in the language I have already given.

The gentleman forgets the distinction between State laws and United States laws. The Constitution gives the President power to execute the laws; but the Constitution speaks only of the laws of the United States, not of the laws of the State governments. The President of the United States and his subordinates have no control whatever over ordinary offenses. Murder, arson, rape, burglary, breach of the peace, &c., are in general crimes only against the State, and not against the General Government. They can be offenses against the General Government only when committed in the District, the Territories, the high seas, or some place under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, as a navy-yard, fort, arsenal, &c.

Let me illustrate the distinction by a case. Suppose that a collection of a tax on whisky or tobacco is taking place under the internal-revenue law. That is a Federal law, a law which Congress has the right to make, and which when made the President is bound to execute. He has the right to see that the law is executed, and (if the proper laws have been passed to enable him) he has the right to invoke all the powers of the Government for the purpose of enforcing that law. The State officers have no right in any way to interfere either to resist or assist.

But suppose that it is a State tax that is involved, a tax which the farmer has to pay upon his land for the support of the State government. Suppose he refuses to pay, and there is a distraint or execution against his personal property and he resists. Did my friend from the Springfield district [Mr. KEIFER] ever hear of any warrant being issued to a United States marshal to collect that tax and to seize that individual's property or person in case of resistance? Oh, no! the marshal of the city of Springfield, or the marshal of the city of Dayton, or the constable of the township, or the sheriff of the county, would be the proper authority to which application should be made after an affidavit was filed. They are State officers, and the State laws are to be executed only by the State authority. With these the President has nothing to do, unless resistance becomes so powerful that the Legislature calls upon him for assistance, or the executive, in case the Legislature cannot be convened. Then, and then only, the law of Congress makes it his duty to assist in suppressing domestic insurrection. The President may see the contest rage for a whole year, yet, if the perfect execution of the Federal law is not prevented nor Government property endangered, he must be a silent spectator until his assistance has been invoked in the constitutional way.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MCMAHON. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I merely want to inquire whether you understood me to say on yesterday that I thought the marshals or deputy marshals of the United States could collect a State tax? That is the proposition you are arguing.

Mr. MCMAHON. I think that the logical result of the broad statement made by the gentleman. The gentleman did not say so in so many words, but his general proposition would finally cover that ground. But I do not wish to understand the gentleman differently from what he desires now to be understood.

Mr. KEIFER. I want the gentleman to understand that he will find nothing of the kind in the RECORD. I said nothing of the kind. If you will permit me I will state that what I said was that the marshal and deputy marshals of the United States, with all other officers of that character, generally denominated the constabulary force of the country, had imposed upon them the duty, whenever they encountered a riot or disturbance that affected the peace or order or the execution of the laws of the country, to preserve the peace and to enforce the law. They are required so to do by the express statutes of the United States as well as by common law. I ask the gentleman if he denies that proposition?

Mr. MCMAHON. I will read the gentleman's language from the RECORD in order to put myself right. He said yesterday:

> Those two cases were excepted in this legislation passed by a republican Congress, and we propose that this legislation shall remain as it now is, so that it shall not be said as a reproach and a stigma upon this country that we have officers, military, naval, and civil, whose duty it is by law, under the penalties to keep the peace everywhere, save and except on one day at least in each year these officers shall be required to fold their arms and look on and witness riot, murder, intimidation, or anything else of an unlawful character, going on before their eyes, or be subject to severe penalties.

Mr. KEIFER. There is nothing there about collecting taxes.

Mr. MCMAHON. No. But suppose a riot should grow out of the collection of State taxes; is not that a breach of the peace? That is the case I have put.

Mr. KEIFER. That is a riot.

Mr. MCMAHON. Is not that a breach of the peace, or, if the gentleman prefers, a riot; and is it not the gentleman's proposition as I have read from the RECORD that it is the duty of the military, naval, and civil officers of the United States "to keep the peace everywhere?" Is not this almost his exact language?

I affirm that it is the duty of the military officers of the United States to "keep the peace," so called, nowhere. It is their duty to suppress insurrection and repel invasion only when called into service, under the President, according to law. One of the crying evils in the past has been that the republican party has scarcely been able to turn its steps without a file of soldiers at its back; it is always looking to the Army for that support which it has rarely found at the hands of the people.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman will allow me to suggest to him that General Washington was President of the United States at the time of the whisky riots and he took the same view that I take on this subject without any statute.

Mr. MCMAHON. I should be very sorry to have General Washington judged by the gentleman on the other side. [Laughter.] We can settle that question by the record hereafter, it is not worth while to consume time on it just now. I think he will discover that General Washington had a law behind him under the authority of which he acted.

Mr. KEIFER. The record was written a long time ago.

Mr. MCMAHON. There have been riots in more recent times; but no matter how formidable those riots, no matter what proportions they took, no matter though one class of society was arrayed against another in the most gigantic and dangerous proportions, the executive power of the General Government has, as I understand, uniformly disclaimed the right to send troops into any State, upon any occasion, for the enforcement of State laws or the protection of private property, until it had been called for by the Legislature, or by the executive, if the Legislature could not be convened.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman will allow me to recall to his memory the fact that in 1859, at the time of the John Brown riot, a then distinguished officer of the United States Army was sent to Harper's Ferry with a military force; and hearing of disturbances over in Maryland, he went into that State with troops for the purpose of making arrests and enforcing civil orders. I refer to no less a person than Robert E. Lee.

Mr. MCMAHON. The gentleman forgets, however, that when the troops were ordered to Harper's Ferry, John Brown had seized and intrenched himself in property which belonged to the Government of the United States.

Mr. WHITE. Why, John Brown was at that time in jail at Charlestown; he was "intrenched" in jail. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. MCMAHON. I must say to the gentleman that I am not quite so familiar with all the details of the John Brown riots as gentlemen on the other side, whose political pabulum it constituted for a great number of years, and I do not remember the particular circumstance to which he alludes; but I think gentlemen will discover, if they look into the matter, that on the occasion referred to there was a call from some official authority for troops under the law as I have explained it.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman will allow me to say that there was no call whatever, and Robert E. Lee, at the head of his military force, went into Maryland. Harper's Ferry, as the gentleman knows, was in Virginia.

Mr. MCMAHON. Well, so far as Robert E. Lee is concerned, his action is unimportant in discussing a constitutional question. He once marched into the gentleman's State when neither the Legislature nor the executive of that State had invited him. We must not be held responsible for everything that he may have done.

Mr. WHITE. I did not hear the gentleman's remark; I ask him to repeat it.

Mr. MCMAHON. I say that upon one occasion General Lee marched into the State to which the gentleman belongs, and never asked the consent either of the Legislature or the executive of that State.

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir; and the gentleman's friends who are working with him on this measure did not assist in driving General Lee out.

Mr. WARNER. I beg the gentleman's pardon for saying that he is mistaken. There are gentlemen on this side who were then fighting in defense of the Union and the flag, and who did help to drive General Lee out of Pennsylvania. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. WHITE. They would not make a majority of the gentleman's party in this Chamber.

Mr. WARNER. Do they on that side? We stand to-day by the principles we defended then. We stand by the same flag, in defense of the primary rights of the people to free elections.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I beg to say that there are more such men on this side than on the other.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to call his attention to the fact that at the very time General Lee was invading Pennsylvania the democratic convention then in session at Chicago was declaring that the effort to drive General Lee out of Pennsylvania was a failure?

Mr. MCMAHON. The democratic convention did then declare in substance that the war would not restore the Union. I, for one, will be glad to admit that the convention was wrong; but the gentleman's party is doing all in its power to prevent perfect union and to verify the prediction of that convention.

But, to return to our subject, Mr. Chairman. What Robert E. Lee may have done, what a President of the United States, whether democratic or republican, may have done upon a former occasion, what even this House may have done when it was republican or when it was democratic, are after all only persuasive arguments based upon the assumption that a democratic or a republican President, a democratic or a republican Congress would not do wrong. I wish the argument had more force; but from our knowledge of human nature we are compelled after all to decide all questions of right and wrong by the inflexible rules of logic and a careful inspection of the Constitution. It is time for a return to the better days of the Republic, when we find these questions construed without reference to political issues then pending, and by statesmen who had no personal interest or partisan measure at stake.

Having now discussed the power of the President to interfere in a State to suppress an insurrection or assist in enforcing State laws, when properly called upon, let us look into the power of the President or of his inferior officers in the execution of the Federal laws.

Prior to 1860 a citizen of the United States scarcely knew that the Federal Government was in existence. Except in connection with his local post-office he rarely saw a Federal office-holder. In those days the power of the Federal courts had not been enlarged as they have been since; and the defendant was rarely dragged away in civil or criminal proceedings to a remote court of the United States. He hardly felt the hand of his Government, so soft was its touch. How changed in these days! I will not discuss by whose fault; but when the burdens of the people are so heavy we should take every proper step to relieve them. A man can scarcely turn around in these days without a collector, a deputy collector, a marshal or a deputy marshal, a commissioner of the United States, or in some States a supervisor of elections at his elbow. The country is full of secret-service men from all the departments of Government. The courts and district attorneys are, in many localities, adjuncts to the political machinery of the party in power, and juries are drawn or constituted out of the most bigoted and persistent adherents of the republican party. Absurd and oppressive test oaths have been provided to rid the jury-box of the intelligent portion of the community. The machinery of the customs and internal-revenue law has been used in the most scandalous manner to promote the prosperity of the party in power. And last but not least, Federal supervision has been asserted over congressional elections, with the power of appointment given to the marshal of the United States, the mere creature of the President, of an unlimited number of deputies to serve on or about election day, with the privileges of arrest and the power to summon the whole posse comitatus to enforce their partisan schemes. The President being invested with power to enforce all these laws and many others, and, under proper authority, to use the whole power of the Government it becomes pertinent to inquire if his power is unlimited or beyond the control of Congress, and if his claim to use the land and naval forces at his own will is well founded.

I affirm, Mr. Chairman, that while the Constitution confers the "executive power upon the President," and orders him to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," it does not define executive power, except in a few instances, nor provide how he shall proceed in the execution of the laws. And I affirm that these details are left to the discretion of Congress, who can say how, where, and when the posse comitatus may be summoned, or how, when, and where the Army may be used in the enforcement of Federal laws.

For, article 1, section 8, (No. 18) of the Constitution says expressly that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Under this clause it cannot deprive the President of his position as Commander-in-Chief, but it may say when and where the Army may be employed; how and when the militia shall be used; and when and how the posse comitatus shall be invoked by any subordinate officer. Congress, therefore, has the right to say that the troops shall not be employed to keep the peace at the polls. If the election be for State officers only, what possible pretext can there be for the presence of Federal troops? If it be a Federal election for Congressmen or electors for President and Vice-President, what right has the President to anticipate disturbance and place soldiery at the polling places before a riot has been commenced or a proper call been made upon him? None whatever. The use of troops in this way is destructive of every principle of free government. In time they will serve the purposes to which Napoleon put them, who had a peaceable election and no ballots cast against him! Putting troops at polling places, as has been done so frequently under former administrations, is in violation of every law of a free government, without warrant in the Constitution, and utterly unknown to the American people until they fell into the hands of the republican party.

The theory of our Government is that the civil is superior to the military authority; that we have no need for the military power, except to repel invasion or to assert the superiority of the civil power. The true theory of our Government goes further; and that is that the military power should never be used except as a last resort, and when judicial proceedings have failed. Even amid the excitement of the opening of our great war of the rebellion, this principle found expression in a law now to be found upon the statute-book:

SEC. 5298. Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstructions, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all of the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed.

In this section will be found recognized much that I have contended for. Congress says that "when it shall become impracticable to enforce the laws of the United States by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings," then it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia or to use the land or naval forces of the United States.

So in another section (section 5300) the law makes it the duty of the President to issue his proclamation in all cases where it becomes necessary to use the troops, commanding the insurgents to disperse, plainly implying that some actual disturbance has already taken place; that insurgents are in the field, who are to be ordered to disperse. How, under such a statute, would it be competent to move the troops into a State and locate them at the polls in anticipation of a disturbance?

That I am not wrong in saying that Congress has always taken the power of saying when the President has the right to move the land and the naval forces can be made apparent from an inspection of the Revised Statutes. I want to cite gentlemen to the neutrality act, in the execution of which it is important frequently for our Government to act promptly if a certain vessel is to be detained or ordered away for our protection. Under such circumstances he is authorized under certain emergencies to use the land and naval forces to compel the detention or prevent the departure of that vessel. So when in a collection district during the war it was impossible for the collector to collect the customs, he was authorized to open his office upon any ship, and under the section of the Revised Statutes which I have here, he was authorized to detain a vessel and to use the land and naval forces until the customs were paid. And at that time, though the President was Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, the first admiral, and as President charged with the execution of the laws and collection of customs, he had no right, in the opinion of a republican Congress in those days, to take this action until Congress had invested him with this power. And so it is throughout these statutes everywhere, it will be found Congress regulates when the President may move the land and naval forces of the United States. It is not for the President to harass the people by their use; but the people are to be governed by the laws, and the troops are only to be called in to carry out those laws on the occasions provided for by Congress, and in the manner Congress has provided. As the President, under the Constitution, has supreme command over the Army, the representatives of the people should never surrender one jot or tittle of their right to regulate, control, and govern that Army. The necessity of our right may not be so apparent to-day as it has been in the past or may be in the future, but the provisions of the Constitution are wise and should be carefully construed in the interest of the people.

Mr. Chairman, for the information of gentlemen I will refer more particularly to the various sections of the statute which they may consult at their leisure. I refer to section 1642 of the Revised Statutes, which confers power, by express enactment of the Congress of the United States, upon the President to call the militia into service to suppress insurrection or repel invasion. This section says, in so many words, that when an invasion or insurrection has taken place (was it lawful before?) or is imminent, it shall be "lawful" for the President to call out the militia. Could he do so without some such statute?

I refer to sections 5287 and 5288, which authorize the President to use the land and naval forces of the United States or the militia thereof for the execution of the neutrality laws. Although it is his duty to execute the law, Congress here determines when he may call on the troops for assistance. I refer to section 5316, where the power is given to the President in the collection of the customs to use the Army or Navy or militia of the United States to detain vessels. I refer to section 4298, where Congress conferred the power on the President to instruct naval commanders to seize certain piratical vessels wherever found on the high seas. All these provisions of law indicate that Congress has always held in its own hands the right to determine how, when, and where the Army may be used not as interfering with the President's right of command. We have had now a discussion about the use of the Army of the United States or the militia. This side of the House, I think, would prefer to place themselves upon the broad ground that whenever the people are to be coerced in an ordinary insurrection it should be done by a posse comitatus or the militia of the country. There is nothing we have inherited more certainly from our ancestors than the hatred of the use of the regular troops in the ordinary struggles and contests between citizen and citizen.

The history of free government is full of such contests. But they are not so destructive as the constant and steady use of regular soldiers to suppress them. I do not speak, understand me, of a contest such as we had in 1861, which was a contest of sections, and not a riot; because then, as we found, the regular Army was utterly inadequate to the occasion. But I refer to the riots, disturbances, &c., that are naturally incident to all free governments. They are much to be regretted. But for my part I prefer the stormy life of freedom to the quietude of despotism. In a good government the people finally rally to its support. And it has been the democratic boast in the past, and will be in the future, that whenever any portion of the people are so far forgetful of their duty to the nation or to the State as to resist the laws either of the State or the Federal Government, the militia of the country should be used to put down any such disturbance and to restore peace and quiet. The great majority of the people resent, and very naturally, the interference of regular soldiers. The regular Army is the machinery which upholds kings and emperors upon their thrones. They are regarded as unfriendly to free government, and as possible instruments in the overthrow of our free institutions. This may be an exaggeration of vigilance, but it is an error upon the safe side.

Before concluding this discussion I wish to call attention to certain other powers possessed by subordinate officers of the Government in the enforcement of the laws. I refer to the power to summon the posse comitatus. The sections of the Revised Statutes conferring it are not numerous.

Under section 1984, a portion of the civil rights law, the commissioners to be appointed under that law have power to appoint, in their respective counties, persons to execute all process issued under that law, and such persons have power to summon the posse comitatus and even the militia or the land and naval forces of the United States.

Under section 2024 the marshal of the United States and his general or special deputies have power in making any arrest to summon the posse comitatus of their district, whether holding a warrant or not.

And under sections 787 and 788, cited yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, the former chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. KNOTT,] the marshals have power to command all necessary assistance in the execution of their duty, and have in addition all such powers as sheriffs may have in the States in which they are called upon to act.

Whether under these sections, in the absence of any law prohibiting him, the marshal could summon the land and naval forces located in his immediate district as a part of the posse comitatus, I need not now discuss. Mr. Cushing may or may not have been right in the opinion which he gave. But we have recently determined by law that he shall not have such power, and the question is no longer open. This is the safer rule.

If gentlemen will examine closely they will observe that, except in the one instance cited—that of arrest at the election—the power to summon the posse comitatus is confined to the marshal of the United States, "executing lawful precepts issued to him under the authority of the United States." He is, in general, the agent or officer of the court. And the whole theory of our Government is, or should be, as expressed in section 5298, that judicial proceedings should be in all cases put in motion first, and that in the execution of such precepts the posse comitatus should be first called, and then the militia or the land or naval forces under the authority of the President.

But it will be observed that by section 2022 the marshal, his general deputies, and his special election deputies have power to arrest, without process, on election day, any person who is alleged to have committed an offense against the election laws in the presence of a supervisor, or any one of the general or special deputies; and that by section 2024 the whole posse comitatus may be called upon by any one of these tools of power to assist him in committing any outrage which his partisan zeal or ignorance or tyranny may stimulate him to perpetrate.

But I do not propose to enter upon a discussion of that statute before the proper time arrives. It is not necessary to leap before we come to the stile. There will be an abundance of time to discuss these questions when they arise and when we know the shape in which they are presented to the House.

The pretext that it is necessary to have troops at the polls to preserve the peace, and that supervisors and deputy marshals are necessary to preserve the purity of elections is only a bald pretense not believed by those who urge it. The great mass of the American people require constant urging to bring them to the polls. We often spend months in an active canvass to convince them of the duty of attending elections. If the people find troops stationed there under the command of the President of the opposite party—often, as we know, one of the most active though quiet workers for the success of his party—they will become indifferent or timorous, and relinquish their right. If the naturalized citizen knows that he is to be subject to the danger of arrest by persons in authority, purposely appointed by leaders of the opposite party to diminish the number of votes against it, he will remain at home rather than take the risk of the trouble or inconvenience to which he may be put. The result will finally be that the adherents of the party in power will be the only ones to approach the polls, and power once gained will be thus perpetuated forever.

Against any authorized interference between the voter and the ballot-box we have raised our protest. The citizen should be as free as air. The penalties against illegal voting are ample. The State laws to preserve the peace are ample. Riots will occur, and illegal voting will take place. Punish the guilty. But let the ballot-box be free, and put no obstacle in the way of the honest voter.

Because these are fundamental propositions, and concern the very existence of the Government, we are making the contest that is now before us. We appeal to the people, and by their judgment are willing to abide.

If it is "revolutionary" to have a free election; to prevent corruption, intimidation, and bribery, at the polls; and to have a jury of impartial citizens to determine all civil and criminal proceedings, then republicanism (which we hope to overturn) has been synonymous with all these crimes against the people.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] to enable him to set himself right upon this question in answer to some remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to have taken any part in this discussion, and I should not now rise to trouble the committee with any remarks, except for a personal reference made by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio to a vote given by me in the House on the law of 1865.

I endeavored at the moment, by a question propounded to the honorable gentleman, to convey a correct idea to the House of the circumstances and of the nature of the law for which I had voted.

I now desire very briefly to state the history of this question so far as it now stands before this House.

The origin of the military power of the President to place troops at the polls is founded on the law of July, 1861, which was a general law at the breaking out of the rebellion, authorizing the Executive to substantially hold military power over the whole country, especially in the insurrectionary States, and in the exercise of that authority. I will not stop to argue whether the power was constitutionally given and constitutionally exercised by the Executive, but in pursuance of the act of July, 1861, the President did exercise entire and complete control over the polls through the military power of the Government. Much complaint occurred in consequence, and there was a gross abuse of this authority. Troops were sent into districts entirely quiet, where there was no necessity for the interference of the military authorities to protect any citizen in the right to the elective franchise, but the power was abused so much that a republican Congress, in 1865, passed this law to which the gentleman has referred and which I desire the Clerk to read, as it is very brief and shows precisely what the democrats did vote for at that time.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall not be lawful for any military or naval officer of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, to order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State of the United States of America, unless it shall be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls. And that it shall not be lawful for any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States to prescribe or fix, or attempt to prescribe or fix, by proclamation, order, or otherwise, the qualifications of voters in any State of the United States of America, or in any manner to interfere with the freedom of any election in any State, or with the exercise of the free right of suffrage in any State of the United States. Any officer of the Army or Navy of the United States, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who violates this section of this act, shall, for every such offense, be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall pay a fine not exceeding $5,000, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than three months, nor more than five years, at the discretion of the court trying the same; and any person convicted as aforesaid shall, moreover, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any officers, soldiers, sailors, or marines from exercising the right of suffrage in any election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified, according to the laws of the State in which he shall offer to vote.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any officer or person in the military or naval service of the United States, who shall order or advise, or who shall, directly or indirectly, by force, threat, menace, intimidation or otherwise, prevent or attempt to prevent any qualified voter of any State of the United States of America from freely exercising the right of suffrage at any general or special election in any State of the United States, or who shall in like manner compel, or attempt to compel, any officer of an election in any such State to receive a vote from a person not legally qualified to vote, or who shall impose or attempt to impose any rules or regulations for conducting such election different from those prescribed by law, or interfere in any manner with any officer of said election in the discharge of his duties, shall for any such offense be liable to indictment as for a misdemeanor, in any court of the United States having jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine cases of misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not exceeding $5,000, and suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary not exceeding five years, at the discretion of the court trying the same, and any person convicted as aforesaid shall, moreover, be disqualified from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust under the Government of the United States.

Approved February 25, 1865.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I hope the committee will allow me a few minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from New York? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, it will be perceived that the act of 1865 gives a construction and places a limitation upon the power of the President in the exercise of the right with reference to the use of troops of the United States. It takes from him the power to place troops at the polls, except to keep the peace, and inflicts penalties upon any military officer who exercises any authority, except in that line and in that direction alone.

Now, that law did pass this House, and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and the distinguished gentleman from Maryland, Henry Winter Davis, opposed the law. Why? Because it limited the power of the President over the troops. The republicans in this House voted against the bill because it placed a restriction upon the power of the President, and they were averse to taking from him any authority by which he could use the military power to overawe the voters at the polls.

Therefore I say that the law of 1865 for which I voted was a great improvement upon the law as it then stood. It was a limitation upon the power of the President. It was in the same line that we are now pursuing. We are trying now to rid ourselves, under the forms of legislation, as rapidly as possible of all those unconstitutional, despotic, and outrageous laws which were passed for party purposes, to maintain wicked power, for the destruction of the rights, interests, and property of the American people.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. The law of 1865, which the gentleman has had read, is the law of to-day. As I understand it, the republican party does not desire to interfere with that law. The only modification now proposed by gentlemen on the other side is to strike out of that law the words "or to keep the peace at the polls." The point we make is that the gentleman from New York, having helped to make that law in 1865 just as it is, is inconsistent in trying to force its repeal upon an appropriation bill, when he made no effort in 1865 to change it by the dotting of an i or the crossing of a t.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, perermit me to say——

Mr. WHITE. I asked the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.]

Mr. CHALMERS. I ask for only a moment.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Very well; I will yield.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire to call attention to the history of this law, which has been so often misrepresented by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. WHITE. If the gentleman is going to make a speech——

Mr. CHALMERS. I shall not be two minutes. I desire to say that the democratic party introduced this law just as it will stand when we make this modification of it. After it was introduced in that form, Mr. Pomeroy, a Senator from Kansas, moved to amend by adding the words "or to keep the peace at the polls."

What did Mr. Powell then say? He was a Kentuckian, whose State had been overrun by armed troops at the polls. He said:

I object to that, for it will destroy the effect of the bill. The State authorities can keep the peace at the polls.

Upon that question every democrat voted against putting that amendment upon the bill, and every republican voted in favor of it. [Applause on the democratic side.]

The democratic party then stood as it stands to-day. After that amendment had been voted upon the bill the Senator from Kentucky, having failed to secure the law as he introduced it, knowing that his State was ground down by the bayonet at the polls, agreed to accept the law even with that amendment upon it, for it would restrict the use of the troops even as amended. And the democratic party of the House voted for it for the same reason.

Mr. WHITE. I now submit that in fairness I should have an opportunity to say something in addition to the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SPARKS. Who is entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHITE. I desire the courtesy of adding to the statement which has just been made by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.] He did not state all the facts of the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] has the floor. Does he yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE?]

Mr. WHITE. I simply ask the courtesy of adding to the history of the law given by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] submitted a question to me which if I have time I desire to answer. I desire to say that the authority given under the law of 1865 to keep the peace at the polls has been shamefully abused. Since the passage of that law the executive authorities have gone far beyond the authority and limitation to keep the peace at the polls. They have used the troops for purposes of intimidation, for the purpose of controlling elections, for the purpose of absolutely compelling the voters at the polls to follow the dictation of the party in power. And no small part of the power of the party now in control of the executive department of the country has been derived from the abuse of that little clause in the act of 1865.

We have now the power in both Houses of Congress. We intend to maintain the civil power of this Government. We believe this is a Government of opinion and of law, not of force or of violence. We mean that the people of this country everywhere shall exercise their rights of suffrage according to the dictates of their own judgment, without executive interference, whether that interference comes in the form of armed soldiers or any other way. In either case it is repugnant to the theory and the institutions of this country.

We intend to maintain that position, and, in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I will say that we are willing to go before the people on this great issue: whether this is a military despotism, whether members of Congress are to be elected at the point of the bayonet, or whether the whole people of the United States, North and South, shall stand upon the equal platform of free suffrage, undominated, unmolested, and uninterfered with by any power except the power of their own consciences and their own judgment.

Mr. WHITE. Before the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] resumes his seat I ask his courtesy that I may add something to the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] in regard to the passage of the law referred to. The gentleman from Mississippi has given correctly a part of the history of the passage of the act. It is quite true that Hon. Lazarus Powell introduced the bill originally and made an elaborate speech upon it; and the question was exhaustively discussed in the Senate of the United States. When the question arose upon the passage of the bill, an honorable gentleman, then a Senator from Kansas, moved to amend by adding the words "to keep the peace at the polls." Those are the objectionable words now—the bone of contention in this controversy. That motion was the subject of some colloquial debate. Incidentally the misuse of the posse comitatus power of marshals in the border-raid troubles in Kansas was brought into the discussion by Mr. Pomeroy. After he had presented the necessity of keeping peace at the polls in order to secure the right of suffrage, the amendment was incorporated upon the bill of Senator Powell. Let me call the attention of the House and the country to the fact that a most distinguished lawyer, then a Senator, now a private citizen, a man whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] will recognize as the Magnus Apollo of the Illinois bar, supported that amendment. I allude to Hon. Lyman Trumbull.

Mr. SPARKS. He was then a republican, was he not?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly he was; but he was a good lawyer, I apprehend, then, as he is now. He sanctioned this amendment. Hon. Mr. McDougall then moved to postpone the bill indefinitely. Mr. Powell said, "No, no;" and upon his request the vote was taken on the passage of the bill, and it was passed. Hon. Mr. Harlan, then a Senator, entered a motion to reconsider, which was subsequently debated; and Hon. Reverdy Johnson (as gentlemen will find if they will follow the debates) made the point, in recognition of the virtue of this amendment, that it was competent to give the President of the United States this power for the purpose of enforcing peace at the polls. The yeas and nays were again called upon the passage of the bill in the Senate, and every democrat voted for it.

The bill came to this House and was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It was reported to the House, and the honorable gentleman, then a conspicuous member of this body as now, voted for it without making any complaint or criticism about this clause. So did my honorable colleague, [Mr. COFFROTH,] who now represents on this floor a republican district, and who, I trust, will be consistent with his record in the final vote on this question. So did every other democrat in this House.

The point we now make is that the democratic party having sanctioned the passage of this bill containing this clause "to keep the peace at the polls," it is little short of revolutionary for them now to come in and undertake to repeal this legislation upon an appropriation bill. This is the point I make, and the point I for one am willing to stand upon before the country.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. VANCE. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] has the floor.

Mr. MILLS. As the gentleman will be entitled to the floor when the committee again goes into Committee of the Whole, I ask him if he will not yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. BELFORD. I will yield the floor for that motion.

Mr. SPARKS. Is not the gentleman from Colorado ready to proceed now? It is not yet four o'clock.

A MEMBER. It is time to adjourn. This is Saturday afternoon.

Mr. SPARKS. I do not think it is quite fair when we have given such extended range to this debate that gentlemen should insist upon adjourning at ten minutes before four o'clock.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Colorado does not insist. Some gentleman on the other side moved that the committee rise, which the gentleman from Colorado consents to provided he can retain the right to the floor.

Mr. SPARKS. Let us hear the gentleman's speech now. There are a great many gentlemen who want to talk on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order; the gentleman from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. CASWELL. With the consent of the gentleman from Colorado, I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. CASWELL. He yields for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado cannot yield except by unanimous consent, unless he yields the floor absolutely.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I protest against that ruling. It is the universal practice of all legislative bodies that a gentleman holding the floor may yield for a motion to adjourn or a motion that the committee rise, without losing his right to resume the floor when the subject is again taken up.

Mr. FORT. When a gentleman holds the floor for a stated time (which is the case here) that is the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado now has the floor——

Mr. HAYES. For one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. For one hour; and if he now yields the floor for a motion that the committee rise, he would not be entitled to the floor again except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. Why, Mr. Chairman, that cannot possibly be a correct ruling, because he has his hour and he may control it; he may compel the House to sit here against its will.

The CHAIRMAN. He has his hour now, and may compel the House to sit now.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that there never was such a proposition made before in any legislative body.

Several MEMBERS. Never.

Mr. BUCKNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the gentleman from Colorado now moves that the committee rise and that motion is carried, will he not be entitled to the floor when the House again goes into Committee of the Whole on this bill?

Several MEMBERS. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. It seems to me such is the rule and the practice.

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] occupied the floor this morning under the operation of the identical rule stated by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.] He obtained the floor yesterday afternoon, and suggested that the committee should rise——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That was by unanimous consent.

Mr. CARLISLE. The committee rose, and the House adjourned And it was held, and very properly held, that the gentleman from Georgia was entitled to the floor when the Committee of the Whole resumed its session to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state——

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly it has never been disputed that a member occupying the floor may yield for a motion that the committee rise or the House adjourn, and will still retain his right to the floor.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to make a motion that the committee rise, provided that by so doing I do not give up my right to address the House on this question when we shall again go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado requests permission to postpone his remarks until this subject is resumed by the House, and that he may yield for a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, and Mr. SPARKS objected.

Mr. FRYE. I would like a ruling on the point of order. It seems to me that there cannot possibly be any question about it, as the Chair must see if he will take into consideration the practice for years past. During the six or eight years that I have served on this floor, in no single instance where a member entitled to the floor for one hour yielded for a motion to adjourn or that the committee rise, has it been ruled that he was not entitled to the floor when the House or Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the question.

Mr. SPARKS. I see that gentlemen on the other side are very desirous that the committee shall rise. I have done everything I could to oblige them; and if it will accommodate them now I will move that the committee rise—anything to oblige those gentlemen.

Mr. REED. The suggestion that the committee rise was first made on the other side, by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS;] and I apprehend that it is not fair for the gentleman to make unqualifiedly the statement he has just made. I presume he did so under a misapprehension.

Mr. SPARKS. I dislike to be placed in any ungracious position toward gentlemen on the other side. I have certainly manifested every possible disposition to oblige gentlemen on both sides of the House.

Mr. HUMPHREY and others. That is so.

M. SPARKS. It struck me we ought to go on a while longer this afternoon with the consideration of this bill, and that the gentleman from Colorado might proceed with his speech now. As there seems to be, however, a general disposition that the committee rise, I make that motion. It has been suggested by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] that my statement a moment ago was unfair. If anybody on this side made a motion that the committee rise, I did not hear it.

A MEMBER, (to Mr. SPARKS.) It was made on this side.

Mr. SPARKS. Well, I never heard it; the gentleman heard more than I did. I am now willing to make the motion in order to oblige gentlemen on both sides.

Many MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. HAYES. I want to have read a paragraph from the Manual.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to refer to the Manual. If the committee should now rise, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Colorado when the Committee of the Whole resumes the consideration of this bill.

Mr. SPARKS. I have made my motion with that understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no disposition to infringe upon the rights of any member.

B. R. LEWIS AND J. J. COFFEE.

Mr. ATKINS. Before the question is taken on the motion that the committee rise, I ask indulgence for the consideration of the joint resolution which I introduced the other day.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the clause in the "Act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1879, making appropriation to pay B. R. Lewis and J. J. Coffee the balance due them respectively as marshal and clerk at the consulate-general at Shanghai, China, be amended by striking out the words "and said Lewis and Coffee shall receive no allowance for witness fees and traveling expenses."

And that the following clause in said act, in relation to the publications of the Geological Survey, namely, the words "under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $100,000," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] one question. As you are aware, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,] these gentlemen, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Coffee, appeared before the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department in connection with the proposed impeachment of Mr. George F. Seward. When the clause referred to in the joint resolution was put into the appropriation bill under your direction as chairman of that committee, I understood that these gentlemen were officers of the Government and that this sum of money was allowed them to cover their expenses, but that they were not to have fees, because they are already compensated for their time as officers of the Government. While appearing as witnesses they were, as they are now, United States officers at the Shanghai consulate. Being officers of the Government, why should we pay them witness fees at the same time we are paying them their regular salaries? I feel very friendly to these gentlemen, and I have no wish to deprive them of a single right; but it occurs to me that if this appropriation be made we shall pay them twice.

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir.

Mr. DUNNELL. Perhaps the gentleman from Tennessee may be able to explain the matter.

Mr. ATKINS. I think I can. The sundry civil appropriation bill contained a clause providing that these men should receive no allowance for witness fees and traveling expenses. I wish to state that witness fees and traveling expenses had already been paid to them; and the Department is under the impression that they should not be allowed the sum provided in the sundry civil appropriation bill, because it was the impression of Congress that witness fees and traveling expenses had already been paid to them.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let me ask the gentleman whether this proposition to amend comes from the State Department?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; it comes from the Treasury Department.

Mr. WHITE. Have these men been paid?

Mr. ATKINS. They have not been. The Department declined to pay them on account of the clause which we now propose to repeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a statement informally, this matter having come within his knowledge as chairman in the last Congress of the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. The Comptroller of the Treasury has declined to pay the sum appropriated to these gentlemen by the last Congress, on account of the clause now proposed to be repealed, holding that traveling expenses should be deducted from the amount appropriated. But as the committee had already provided for such expenses, the Department by this ruling simply deprives these men of any benefit whatever from the appropriation made by Congress. This amendatory joint resolution has been introduced in pursuance of the request of the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. DUNNELL. If we pay these men fees as witnesses, are we not at the same time paying them salaries as officers?

The CHAIRMAN. They have already received their traveling expenses.

Mr. WHITE. I would like to have some explanation of this matter of $100,000 mentioned in the joint resolution.

Mr. ATKINS. That is another matter which I will explain. The clause which we propose to strike out in regard to the $100,000 is merely verbiage. There was an appropriation of $100,000 for the geological survey, and in the enrollment of the bill this language was repeated; so that it might seem that there was a double appropriation. To prevent any construction of that kind we propose to repeal this redundant clause.

Mr. CONGER. Will this repeal affect the appropriation of $100,000?

Mr. ATKINS. Not in the least. I move that the resolution be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The question then recurring on the motion of Mr. SPARKS, that the committee rise, it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon. He further reported the Committee of the Whole, having had under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act, approved March 3, 1879, had directed him to report the same to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) just reported from the Committee of the Whole with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. ATKINS. I move the previous question on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed for a third reading.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT TILL TUESDAY.

Mr. EWING. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. SPARKS. I desire to obtain, if I can, unanimous consent that the Army appropriation bill be taken up on Monday as unfinished business, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. EWING. I object to dispensing with the morning hour.

Mr. SPARKS. Then I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

Mr. EWING. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 25, noes 118.

Mr. EWING. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

So (one-fifth not voting in favor thereof) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. SPARKS was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] that the House adjourn.

Mr. EWING. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPARKS. I renew it.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS IN CINCINNATI.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following as the select committee to investigate certain elections in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, in accordance with the resolution adopted on motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCMAHON.]

Mr. CARLISLE of Kentucky, Mr. KENNA of West Virginia, Mr. NEW of Indiana, Mr. SAMFORD of Alabama, Mr. CONGER of Michigan, Mr. BROWNE of Indiana, and Mr. ROBINSON of Massachusetts.

The Chair desires to state in this conection that the gentleman from Ohio who introduced the resolution for the appointment of this committee has declined to serve as chairman; and consequently the Chair has appointed another gentleman to act in that capacity.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. ACKLEN, indefinitely, on account of sickness;

To Mr. VAN VORHIS, until Wednesday next; and

To Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, until Wednesday next.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SPARKS, that the House adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday next.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Dr. Henry W. Birkey, to be reinstated as an assistant surgeon in the United States Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs, when appointed.

By Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois: The petition of Mrs. William Blair and 60 other women, of the Second Presbyterian church of Chicago, Illinois, for such legislation as will make effective the anti-polygamy law of 1862—to the Committee on the Judiciary, when appointed.

By Mr. HOUSE: The petition of Sperry & Co. and others, for the repeal of section 7 of the revenue law relating to wine and distilled and fermented liquors—to the Committee of Ways and Means, when appointed.

By Mr. KEIFER: The petition of S. M. Wellman and others, members of Harrison Grange, Logan County, Ohio, for the passage of the Reagan interstate-commerce bill—to the Committee on Commerce, when appointed.

By Mr. LE FEVRE: The petition of William E. Terwilliger and others, of Buckeye Grange, Auglaize County, Ohio, of similar import—to the same committee, when appointed.

Inasmuch as the memorial affects the title of the land on which these Indians are located, I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I present also a memorial of the representatives of the Santee Sioux tribe of Indians protesting against their removal. Mr. VANCE. I present the memorial of certain citizens of North Carolina in favor of an appropriation for the improvement of Beaufort Harbor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VANCE. As it is short I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the memorial.

The memorial was read, as follows:

Memorial of the citizens of Beaufort, North Carolina, to Congress.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the undersigned citizens of Beaufort and the county of Carteret, State of North Carolina, respectfully shows: That the bar and harbor of Beaufort have had the attention of the United States Government for nearly a century, during which period they have been seven times surveyed, so that reliable data can be had as to the advantages of this port for commercial and naval purposes; that there is no other port available as a harbor of refuge between Norfolk and Charleston, and no other on the entire Atlantic coast to excel it for accessibility and close proximity to the sea; that the distance from the ocean at the five fathom line, outside of Beaufort bar to the wharves of said town, is but three miles; that a depth of from eighteen to thirty feet of water can be carried from sea to within one mile of Beaufort; that at this point a bulkhead or bank exists which impedes navigation and compels vessels destined for Beaufort to discharge into lighters; that along the old wharf line of said town there is a depth of some fifteen feet; that the eastern approach to Beaufort Harbor from Core Sound, owing to neglect, has so filled in that no vessels can pass through; that during the war of 1812 this port was of great value and service to the country; that during the recent unhappy war with the South the fleets and supply-ships of the United States rendezvoused at this place, deriving great benefit from its accessibility and capacity; that notwithstanding all these advantages Government has never expended any funds upon its improvement.

That the United States Government since the days of Washington has had in contemplation a great inland coast water route from Chesapeake Bay to Georgia, so as to avoid the well-known dangers of Cape Hatteras; that there now exists a channel connecting Beaufort Harbor with the Neuse River arm of Pamlico Sound through an old canal partly constructed by the State of North Carolina, which State proposes to throw it open to the free commerce of the country if Congress will widen and deepen it so that vessels drawing sixteen feet can pass through; that said water route will be of incalculable benefit to the commerce of the country, as well as to the interests of this locality, besides giving access to a fresh-water iron-clad harbor, unequaled by any on this coast for security and proximity to the sea.

That an important Government port is located at the entrance of this harbor, the protection of which from the encroachments of the sea and tides is intimately connected with the work proposed for improving and conserving this harbor, and regarding which there should be concert of action between the Government and local authorities.

Wherefore your memorialists would respectfully pray that Congress would be pleased to grant an appropriation of $100,000 for the improvement of Beaufort Bar and Harbor, and the inland and coast water-approaches to said port, to be expended under the direction of the Engineer department of the United States.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Samuel M. Thatcher, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McDONALD. I notice in the RECORD of March 28 that certain documents introduced by me relating to the United States Marine Hospital Service were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. They should have been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I desire that reference to be made now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reference will be corrected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the subject?

Mr. McDONALD. Certain documents relating to the United States Marine Hospital Service, showing the necessity of an appropriation of $2,500 to be made in order to comply with the provision of the act of March 3, 1875, to promote economy and efficiency in the Marine Hospital Service, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be prepared a schedule of the average number of seamen required in the safe and ordinary navigation of registered, enrolled, and licensed vessels of the United States, in order that certain assessments might be made on each master or owner of a vessel subject to such dues. The resolution to which the documents relate was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order for the change of reference will be entered.

Mr. McDONALD. I now offer additional papers relating to the same subject; and I move that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

CLERK TO THE COMMITTEE ON PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred a resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] on the 26th instant, authorizing the select committee on the elections of President and Vice-President of the United States to employ a clerk, have instructed me to report it with an amendment, and recommend that the resolution as amended be adopted.

The amendment reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, after the words "clerks of the Senate," to insert "during the sessions thereof;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the select committee to take into consideration the state of the laws respecting the ascertaining and declaration of the result of the elections of the President and Vice-President of the United States be authorized to employ a clerk at the per diem salary paid other committee clerks of the Senate during the sessions thereof; and the necessary expenses of said committee be paid out of "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

The bill (S. No. 266) to provide additional accommodations for the Library of Congress was read the second time by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, as I have already intimated, if this bill had come up for action at the last session I was prepared to submit some remarks upon it. As it is now proposed to refer the same subject by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] to the Committee on the Library, I avail myself of the present occasion to make some observations upon the subject, supposing that it has not yet lost all of its interest.

I should not comment upon the proposed reference to a commission of skilled persons were the reference to be made of the questions involved in a less narrow, and, what seems to me, illiberal spirit; and I ask, is it quite fair to fetter the judgment of such a commission by the exclusion of all alternatives in the terms of submission? Either this or nothing?

If I venture to have any opinions as to a new library, or as to the Capitol and its grounds, it is mainly because it has been assigned to me as part of my duty to give the subject some attention for many years past. In consideration of this fact, I neither ask nor expect any one to accept of my conclusions, but merely that I may be permitted to give them utterance and place them on record for whatever they may be worth, and as the best excuse, lame as it may be, I have to offer for presuming to differ with some distinguished Senators to whose opinions I am accustomed to pay the greatest respect.

I know it is regarded by many as evidence of esthetic culture and critical acumen to disparage American art, and especially all works belonging to the Government at Washington. Just now a cold wave of depreciation has visited us, and Senators are being taught to snap their fingers at the Capitol. I do not feel bound to defend everything we have here, certainly not all of our bronze horse millinery memorials, but surely there are some things which an American may praise without blushing; and, before we dismiss the Capitol with a sneer, it might be more prudent to inquire whether or not among all the most advanced nations of the earth even where they are not without schools of fine arts, anything much better is to be found. A truthful answer to this query might tend to reconcile us to "bear those ills we have, rather than fly to others we know not of," and possibly rescue us from the higher accented criticism of those who may twenty-five years hence find greater provocation to "damn" us "with faint praise" than we do those who twenty-five years ago had the responsible duty of giving shape and form to the present Capitol.

It must not be forgotten that seven years ago Congress authorized prizes to the amount of $5,000 to be awarded for plans of a new library, and upwards of twenty were obtained. Nothing else was then contemplated. Since then—two years ago—a commission was appointed to inquire into the best mode of providing accommodations for the Library, either inside or outside of the Capitol. That commission industriously investigated the subject and consulted many architects, including the architect of the new dome and wings, and their conclusions, as reported, were as follows:

It was earnestly desired to find some method for supplying the needed accommodations within the Capitol building; but, after considering several plans suggested for that purpose, the commission unanimously concluded no such plan was practicable.

They also added:

The Capitol is universally conceded to be a very fine structure. It has certainly been a costly one. The whole expenditure upon it has been more than thirteen millions. It would be poor economy to deface the Capitol in order to provide for the Library.

It thus appears that a most respectable commission, formed of members of both Houses of Congress and others, have had all sides of this question under thorough and careful consideration, and then unanimously decided against any defacement of the Capitol in order to provide for a library. But when this question was last before the Senate this decision was overruled and reversed, and the views of the minority were wholly excluded from any representation in the new commission proposed, an amendment having been made which struck out all provisions relating to a library outside of the Capitol, while another amendment that the "practical changes" should be such as could be made "without serious injury to the architectural effect of the building" was curtly rejected. The minority had no rights which the majority felt inclined to respect. I much fear that the very distinguished promoters of this new commission intend to push and agitate the question of a new Capitol and to hang it dangling somewhere to the fringe of the old one. That such a thing is humanly "practicable" cannot be denied, as it is "practicable" to jump out of the frying-pan into the fire. That it would be wise, economical, and in good taste would be seriously disputed, if it had not so many eloquent advocates. It would be a step down as to the site, and a step up as to cost. Architect Walter—and there can be no better authority—estimates the cost of a single two-hundred-and-seventy-five-feet projection, in the style of the Capitol, at $4,000,000, or as more expensive than would be a separate building, constructed in a style better adapted to the uses of a library. The experiment when tried may not prove to be one of the greatest blunders of the age, but there is no other in process of incubation, as it seems to me, of more rotund and portly dimensions.

The absolute necessity of providing greater space for the Library of Congress needs little argument beyond that for years annually presented by the Librarian. The fact that more than seventy thousand volumes, or more than the entire Library contained in 1860, are now tumbled about on the floor or stacked up in alcoves wholly inaccessible, certainly speaks in volumes for more room. The annual increase of the Library, which prior to 1864 was no more than about four thousand volumes, is now multiplied to eight or ten times that number, and reaches a rate quite equal to that of the British Museum, conducted on an immensely costlier scale and covering eight acres of ground. The report of our present Librarian, in 1872, showed that the Library had doubled twice in twelve years; but it is more than five times greater now than it was nineteen years ago. The ratio of increase for the future will not be diminished, but will continue to grow larger and larger, and should be promptly and decently provided for.

The annual accessions obtained by copyright amount to nearly ten thousand volumes, and, with pamphlets, are equal to about fourteen thousand volumes. These are free of cost, and, being in duplicate, require additional room each year for twenty-eight thousand publications. These works are held, not only for public use, but as a matter of record, for the benefit and protection of the authors. The foreign exchanges received by the Smithsonian Institution became so voluminous that the Regents were unable to furnish room for them—the Smithsonian building was not large enough—and, valuable as these exchanges were and continue to be, a surrender of these large acquisitions had to be made to the Library of Congress. We accepted the trust gladly, and it should be guarded with fidelity. These works annually amount to twenty-five hundred volumes and nearly as many pamphlets. The Library receives, also, by purchase, by exchange, and by donation, nearly ten thousand additional volumes. The new shelf-room to be provided, inclusive of that for maps, charts, musical compositions, engravings, photographs, and chromos, is, therefore, equal to not less annually than forty thousand volumes. Further, in addition to the Library proper, we need many other rooms and offices for the current and multifarious business of the institution. There is no packing-room, no room for cataloguing, no reading-room, and no room for the Librarian. The copyright records, including the custody of the original records of all the States and Territories, also demands a room by itself. It is questionable whether any State or municipal library of the country has ever been suffered by its very riches to be crowded into a more embarrassed and miserable condition.

The present central room of the Library holds forty-five thousand volumes; or, if properly selected, might hold possibly all those mainly sought for reference by Congressmen. The additions to the Library, completed in 1866, greatly enlarged its capacity. Each additional room holds eighty-five thousand volumes; but, in thirteen years, this enlargement of the Library to nearly five times its former capacity is found to be deplorably inadequate. The unyielding truth is that we have got to move Congress out to give room to the Library, or move the Library out to give room for Congress. We must stop all further increase, and either reduce the Library to the stinted and specific wants of Congress alone, or permit it to advance to national importance, and give it room equal to the culture, wants, and resources of a great people. Any mere enlargement will be a temporary expedient, and by the time completed more room would be required. The higher education of our common country demands that this institution shall not be crippled for lack of room. Of course, the bill of the Senate Committee on the Library, as finally presented, did not represent the unanimous conclusion of the committee, if judged by their report made heretofore, but was brought here in obedience to the action of the Senate. No matter what the precise shape of that action may have been, it is fair to interpret it as a proposition for a new Capitol, or, if not that, then as a postponement of the question until a more convenient season. Nothing more can be expected from experts and artists, selected to do a work foreordained, than a presentation of some constrained plans for the extension of the Capitol. They are to be so instructed. They will furnish the pictures. They can do no less than to supply the specific demand insisted upon by those under whose authority they are to act, and especially if there should be an undimmed prospect of finding future employment in the construction of their new plans. The answer to the Hudibrastic question: "What makes all doctrine plain and clear?" was, "A thousand pounds a year," and can be understood by modern draughtsmen, I do not say architects, as well as by ancient theologians. But whenever any cute and fertile genius, feeling himself equal to the great emergency, shall have brought forth a plan for an addition to the Capitol of such dimensions as will be required for a new chamber here, and a new hall in the other end of the Capitol, and be also sufficient for the future requirements of the Library of Congress, conducted in accordance with the provisions of existing laws, I feel sure that it will be nothing else than a huge excrescence upon whatever there is of simplicity and grandeur, or of classic beauty, in the present appearance of the Capitol. Then, fortunately, it may be expected, that all of the critics, especially all whose ideas or suggestions have been ignored or rejected, will unite in such a general hue and cry as will give the quietus to any incongruity, whether projected from the front or rear of the Capitol, destitute as it must be, of dignity, grace, or practical fitness. Unprejudiced public opinion, it is to be hoped, may be safely trusted to combat so large an architectural disfigurement.

The sites of buildings, public or private, is a matter scarcely less important than the buildings themselves. Of all people in the world, Americans should be the last to deny this fact. The ancient Athenians understood this when they placed the Parthenon on the Acropolis and other temples in such places as proves they were alive to all the grand beauties of nature. Notwithstanding that nature has done her part in furnishing rare and beautiful sites, yet the number of rare and beautiful buildings where such sites have been utilized appears deplorably small. A low and sunken location for a lofty and important edifice presents an anti-climax; and a narrow and circumscribed location forces architecture into a strait-jacket. To afford room to the eye of the spectator, for a proper view of any structure worth looking at, requires ample space or a wide margin set apart for and belonging to that structure and to no other. A good neighborhood is almost as essential to architecture as to society. A noble building must have standing room equally noble, or the effect will be discordant and incurably degraded; and such a building, without reposing upon a sufficient landscape, is as pitiable as a ship afloat on too little water. The Interior Department, one of our largest public buildings, and a creditable specimen of classic architecture, was born to "blush unseen" because all of its frontal elevations crowd upon and slop over narrow streets. The General Post-Office was also imprisoned by equally restricted boundaries. If we are forced to admit blunders of this character, we are clear of any so conspicuous as that presented in London by the flat location of the new Houses of Parliament, standing—like the angel in the Apocalypse, one foot on land and one on water—exposed on the Thames to river malaria, and unrelieved elsewhere by any considerable open spaces.

It will hardly be disputed that the present site of the Capitol is one of the finest that has ever been decorated with parliamentary or legislative buildings. No other, so far as I am advised, is comparable to it, save that at Versailles, and that is not better. What nature has lavishly bestowed should not be irreverently squandered in the name of art. It is plain, however, that the grounds here are none too extensive. The vista on the western front is too short and brief. if the mass of the buildings were to be increased, good taste would require a more than proportionate increase of the grounds; but the natural features of the grounds forbid their occupation by buildings of greater bulk. Capitol Hill cannot be expanded and may easily be overloaded.

To abandon the Halls we have for any possible annex, extending the present pile in known or unknown directions, would inevitably cover and hide some of the chief merits of the present site. To project wings from each end of the western front would leave the Dome on that side apparently supported by only the old central portion of the Capitol; or, if such wings started on a base fifty feet below the present foundations, dislocated at the point of junction at the start, they would be buried in the earth at one end and rest on Goose Creek or be propped up by an awkward wall at the other. In this repulsive process and down-hill march of the Capitol much of the hill itself might be expected to vanish. This idea seems to have secured the sudden admiration of those who may be supposed to unduly appreciate Bernini's colonnade, which encircles the piazza of St. Peter's at Rome; but that vast and meaningless coil—two hundred and eighty-four columns supporting nothing—has not received the approval of later ages, and has been, not unfittingly, styled "a scorpion with a double tail." Most certainly it is an architectural atrocity, produced, not by Michael Angelo, but by one whose opportunity sometimes exceeded his knowledge of the severe and simple requirements of true art. An exact reproduction here of Bernini's elliptic extension of St. Peter's, sixty feet high, would be only a little more execrable than the proposed rectangular extension of the wings on the western front of the Capitol, which would borrow no grace from the conspicuous absurdity of the ancient example. Any extension which could possibly furnish one-fourth part of the room needed for a new library of Congress would not only cruelly distort the Capitol itself, utterly destroying its admirable singleness of design, but would be an equally flagrant maltreatment of the Capitol grounds. It would be a capital mistake to do either; and, if I can be pardoned for saying so, it would be shameful to do both.

The grounds on the west front of the Capitol were originally intended to be, and should forever remain, its introductory foreground, with whatever of magnificence it may claim undiminished; but, with the Senate and House wings extended three hundred feet westward, these grounds would be invaded and hopelessly incumbered; the approach and view, which must be mainly by Pennsylvania avenue, would graze one of the new-fangled extensions, and strike the Capitol askew, or apparently much more diagonally. The point of convergence of Pennsylvania and Maryland avenues, according to the plan upon which the city of Washington was built, is the center of the Capitol; and the symmetry and beauty of this plan, which all must concede, would be thwarted and confounded by any large and obtrusive overlapping additions to the western front of the Capitol.

On the eastern front, I regret to say, it has been also proposed to extend the central part, so as to offer room for a new and a larger Library. This would change the congressional character of the Capitol to that of ecclesiastical architecture, or to a Greek cross, of which I venture to say there is no example in any parliamentary building in the world. I am glad to believe that this proposition, persistently pressed as it may be, is not likely to have any considerable number of adherents among architects. The objections to it are many and formidable:

First. It would be a destructive intrusion upon the grounds so recently expensively enlarged, and greatly improved. These grounds should have some repose. The shade-trees, now satisfied with their homes, ask to be left undisturbed. The very pavements cry out "let us alone!"

Second. It would bar and destroy the main eastern entrance to the Rotunda of the Capitol.

Third. The central entrance to the eastern and the main front should be forever retained for the national purpose of the inauguration of the President of the United States. The two Houses of Congress and the Supreme Court, with the President-elect and the outgoing President, meeting and passing through the Rotunda to the eastern central portico for the purposes of this grand ceremony, as they have done for more than a half of a century, have so consecrated this portion of the Capitol for such services that it should never be sacrificed, and, if sacrificed by one Congress, the next will call for its restoration. The plaza or open court in front is none too large to accommodate the increasing multitude of people who once in four years will make a pilgrimage hither to see how republican institutions, designed for the greatest good of mankind, work and prosper.

Fourth. An extension of the eastern central portico beyond the face of the wings would, when viewed from a northerly or southerly approach, intercept and cut off more than one half of the present apparent extent and grandeur of the eastern façade, leaving, as to length, nothing visible but a wing.

Fifth. A central extension in the same style of the Capitol would, according to the estimate of competent architects, be much more expensive than a separate and independent library building.

Mr. Walter, of Philadelphia, the architect of the extension of the Capitol and the new dome, is a man of undoubted skill and taste in his profession, having few superiors in classic architecture in America; and the general verdict, unless I have greatly misunderstood it, has been that his work, with every allowance for points of minor criticism, must be accepted as a success. Possibly we may have Senators and Members of Congress who might have done better; or, as the lady in Boston who, upon hearing the play of Hamlet for the first time, with which she was delighted, said that "she did not believe there were more than six men in Boston who could write a better play;" so it may be doubted whether among all the members of Congress there are more than six who would do better than Mr. Walter. Congress, it may be remembered, could not agree upon any plan among the many suggestions for the original extension, and at last it was wholly devolved upon the President of the United States.* And even at the last session of the Senate the learned and respected Joint Committee on the Library, after painful labor, brought forth nothing more than a carte blanche for each of their chairmen to offer any proposition they might esteem best, and they both decided, after all their enlightened discussion in the committee, to favor a separate library building. They did not agree with the famous maxim of Lord Melbourne, that "the safest thing you can do is to do nothing," but boldly stated they wanted a separate library.

I have not heard the exterior of the Capitol depreciated except, perhaps, as to the size of the Dome; and I think if Senators will examine as to all the buildings in the world with notably large domes, they will not find this too large, unless the others are also too large. The Dome of the Capitol was unquestionably copied, but much improved, from the first design made by Sir Christopher Wren for St. Paul's Cathedral, for which the dome of St. Peter's served, if not as a model, at least as a hint, and as that of the Duomo at Florence possibly served for St. Peter's; and Sir Christopher made a reputation by his numerous works that leaves him easily the foremost architect of England, even to this day, though the dome proposed for St. Paul's was more excessive in its proportions to the building which was to give it support than that of the Capitol, designed by Mr. Walter.

A large dome is necessarily the principal feature of any structure it surmounts. Good taste is exhibited in the Capitol, in the sky line of the entablature. It is not too much broken up. There are no towers, and the minor domes are not in prominent and distractive attendance as satellites.

The Dome of the Capitol is no sham, supported by inside cheap subterfuges, but is wholly of iron; not partly of wood, like St. Paul's, nor partly of brick, like St. Peter's; and the boldness and skill exhibited in its construction was a signal triumph of mechanical engineering. Surely it is far more appropriate in form and graceful outline than the former flat dome which it succeeds, even though that was copied from the Roman Pantheon. But the Dome will doubtless take care of itself. That, at least, is safe from additions. It is the remainder of the building that may need protection.

Some comparisons have been made of our Capitol with the new Parliament houses in London, not complimentary to the position of our legislative halls in the interior or in a so-called iron box from which light and air were said to be excluded; but it seems not to have been understood that both the House of Lords and the House of Commons, with ninety-seven different plans originally to select from, are inclosed in nearly the same manner as are our Houses here, and wholly surrounded by not dissimilar lobbies and corridors.

The sittings of Parliament for the most part take place at night, and therefore they have little occasion to provide for sunlight. They have painted windows aloft, high above the galleries, but these are shielded by exterior glass, and neither are ever opened for the admission of good air or the escape of bad. Their system of ventilation, after some changes, is now, with only slight differences of detail, exactly similar to what we have here, or the air is forced in from below and exhausted at the top, and good, most certainly, when attentively and properly cared for. When the engineers are something more than locomotive engineers, understanding the apparatus and keeping it constantly in order, as the Senate engineer generally does, though more assistants would be useful, there ought to be no just ground for complaint. Of course, it may happen sometimes that the air has not been properly warmed or cooled, or that it has too little or too much moisture, or that the desirable mean temperature cannot be correctly agreed upon by Senators; but I believe it is not extravagant to say that no better ventilated hall of equal dimensions can be found than the Senate Chamber. Different temperaments, different constitutions, and different conditions of health will often demand at the same moment temperatures varying more than twenty degrees. Changes occur before and after speaking, or before or after dinner. The influence of the atmosphere is greatly modified by its velocity as well as temperature, and frequently further modified by its electrical condition and by the amount of moisture present. Mr. Reid, the constructor in charge of the heating and ventilation of the new Houses of Parliament, testified that the only full relief for all complaint would be power to examine and perhaps regulate the atmosphere under each bench where members sit. But this would, I think, make a telephone necessary to communicate the wishes of members to the attendant. Open windows, beyond being an enemy to all executive or secret sessions of the Senate, would often furnish too much of windy currents to those nearest, if just enough to those remote, and would always add to the noise within all the noise without. Moreover, the laws of acoustics forbid open windows. They neither admit of ease in speaking or hearing, as every current of air misleads the voice or the sense of hearing.*

In the Houses of Parliament, when all are present, there is not room—twenty inches being calculated for each member—for more than two-thirds of the members to be seated. On all extraordinary occasions the ordinary members have to flee to the extraordinary seats provided in the galleries; and the place allotted to strangers, I think, accommodates about one hundred, or only "the elect and precious" admitted on tickets, while here we have seats for every Senator and for one thousand spectators in the galleries, who may be here at one hour and gone the next. Ventilation is here a very variable quantity. In the House of Representatives the galleries have seats for about twelve hundred persons. Of course, with so much space open to all comers, to all colors, and to all conditions of life, with no public baths in the city, there will be generated much impure air that should be driven out, but often the prolific cause of impure air, the crowd in the galleries, cannot be driven out without standing much upon the order of going. The trouble is that a fresh supply of foul air is constantly produced, partly compounded with the smoky exhalations of tobacco which find their entrance to the Halls from corridors and ante-rooms through all open passages.

Let me add that the library of the House of Lords and that of the House of Commons are very inferior in comparison with our own, certainly not more accessible, and hardly containing more volumes in either one than were added to our Library during the year just closed. They are, in fact, surpassed in extent by many libraries belonging to private gentlemen, both in this country and in England.

In addition to what I have stated as to the houses of the British Parliament, let me say that the German Parliament House at Berlin and the prize design made for it, but not used, by Sir G. G. Scott, the House of Peers and the House of Deputies in Paris, and the House of Parliament at Vienna, as well as that at Pesth, in Hungary, and that at Sydney, in New South Wales, each of them comparatively modern structures, are all constructed with their legislative halls completely enfolded in the interior; boxed, as some do say, very like our own, lighted from skylights, and surrounded with similar corridors and offices. The House of Deputies at Versailles must also be placed in the same list. The sources of light and air are not greater in any of these than are found here, and the air is all admitted at the bottom and exhausted at the top. They all have just as much of the "exhausted receiver" as we have here, and yet nobody abroad "smells a rat." At five or more different capitals of Europe their accommodations are in no respect superior to our own. Those who may not have seen the Parliament Houses to which I have referred I hope will find time to examine the ground-plans and elevations of each one of them, when they will see the facts are as I have stated.*

* The old Hall of the House of Representatives was described by a speaker there, July 20, 1850, as a "mammoth cave, in which men might speak in all parts and be understood in none. It was constructed with a view to concentrate the voice of the member on the Speaker's ear, leaving every one else deaf. Better that the member should be dumb, too, unless a different hall should be given to them."

So far as sunlight is concerned here or in the House of Representatives, it can be had at any time whenever required, as the iron shutters on the inside of the glass roof were originally movable, and may be adjusted at any time so as to admit much or little.

I confess that I look with some apprehension upon the idea of further patch-work on the Capitol. The last extension was intended to put a full stop to anything beyond. When the east and west centers shall each be brought out twenty or thirty feet as they will be when the soft sand-stone shall be replaced with marble, and finished in harmony with the wings, it will be all that was originally designed. It will then be the completed work of Mr. Walter, who, if not a great artist, is certainly not a mean one; and better qualified than all other men to give counsel as to any impending changes. No conceited American Bernini should be permitted to botch the Capitol. Decried as that may be, it is likely to be long esteemed as not only the most ambitious but the best work we have.

Some spiritualist, I believe, undertook to add some closing chapters to the last work of Dickens, but they proved to be a ridiculous failure. The attempt of later sculptors to restore the missing parts of some ancient torso has often been made, but rarely satisfactorily. A painting retouched by a different hand is apt to sink to a mere daub. The Capitol should be let alone. Neither swag-bellied centers, nor right-angled tail-ends can be added without destroying the imposing façades of the east and west fronts. Add a pile here, and just such another there, and we should have a block suggestive of diverse uses, commercial or charitable, manufacturing or insane, but no longer stamped as the home of the American Congress.

The idea that one or both of the legislative Halls of Congress can be easily converted into a library or a branch library has been hinted at. It is very plain that the difficulty and cost of such a conversion would be great, and when made would offer only awkward and inferior accommodations. The misfit of a second-hand garment would everywhere crop out. The space surrendered could not be wholly utilized, and so much of it as in some way and in some years might be utilized would still be insufficient for a permanent future library. Moreover, the library, lodged in different rooms, would no longer be a unit or under the charge of a single head. The parts of the library would be so widely separated that the supervision of different librarians, having charge of different divisions of the catalogue, would be indispensable. The administration, vibrating between one room and another, would be both expensive and confused. The time and cost of remodeling the Halls and adapting them to the uses of a library would be as great as to remodel them upon the idea of a better adaptation to the purposes of legislative halls, and the latter would appear to be the more rational proposition if any change must be made. Whatever may be done, it will never reach perfection, "hardly ever." "Man never is, but always to be blest."

Washington is to be no mean city. It is the capital of the people; and its public buildings and grounds belong to the nation, and they will be jealously guarded as the apple of its eye. In the not very distant future, to be waited for no longer than the brief time covered by my own congressional service, there will be a hundred million Americans taking pride in republican institutions, and fully conscious of their growth. Not to comprehend this fact as sure to appear in the annals of our country, is to play the part of children whose works will soon be pushed aside by full-grown men.

When that time arrives it is not wholly impossible that the prediction of an officer, creditably connected with the extension of the Capitol, will not be fulfilled, that is to say, that around the entire grounds of the eastern front of the Capitol, as once were around the bounding-lines of the ancient Roman Forum, there will yet be large public buildings, such as courts, libraries, museums, and departmental offices, that will be hereafter imperatively required by the augmentation of States and the ever-increasing wants of the Government. It must be conceded that the idea is progressive and possibly too magnificent; but, if all of the Executive Departments had originally been constructed around one large square, not only would public convenience have been better consulted, but the general effect would have been more imposing than that produced by the Departments which have strayed away from both the Capitol and the Executive Mansion.

I have advocated the erection of a separate Library building on a part of these grounds east of the Capitol, because it would be most convenient and cost the least money, and because a separate building seems to me to be a pressing necessity.

If I have taken up any time of the Senate it is because I conceive the subject to be one of no ordinary importance. It concerns us, and more concerns those who will come after us. We should be careful in seeking to correct what we call a blunder not to make another which will admit of no correction. I have endeavored to show that the present Capitol deserved less of harsh criticism than has been bestowed upon it, and that its minor defects can be easily remedied. I have attempted also to show that the present site is far too good to be covered by random dreams of flank extensions or swell-head projections, and have also tried to demonstrate that we cannot well get on any longer without a library by itself. My duty, however imperfectly discharged, is ended, and I shall not distrust the ultimate decision of Congress.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Library.

The motion was agreed to.

REFRIGERATING VESSEL FOR DISINFECTION.

Mr. HARRIS rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the consideration of the Calendar of general orders. The first bill on the Calendar of general orders is that called for by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.]

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to contract with Mr. John Gamgee for the construction of a steel refrigerating steam-vessel, to be used at the quarantine of such of the ports of the United States as may be recommended by the National Board of Health, to disinfect vessels and cargoes from ports suspected of infection with yellow fever or other contagious disease; the construction of the vessel to be under the inspection of an officer of the Bureau of Steam Engineering of the Navy, who may, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy for that purpose; and $200,000 is appropriated for the construction, to be immediately available.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Tennessee with regard to this Professor Gamgee, as to the propriety of contracting with him alone. Are there not other persons who might be willing to contract and as competent to contract to the satisfaction of the Government as the person named?

Mr. HARRIS. In answer to the question of the Senator from Kansas I desire to say that Professor John Gamgee, somewhat distinguished for his attainments in sanitary science, has made extensive experiments in the matter of refrigeration. He has a plan by which he asserts that he can produce any given temperature throughout any vessel of fifteen hundred tons burden, or indeed any vessel of any size; but within a very few moments in a vessel of fifteen hundred tons burden he can produce any temperature that may be desired to the point of freezing.

If we had a plan of our own that we proposed to carry out upon distinct specification, I should at once answer the Senator from Kansas that there would be no propriety in authorizing a contract with a single individual; but we have no such plan. Professor Gamgee has a plan that he asserts with positive certainty can produce the results referred to. We know of no other gentleman who has—it is his own—to the extent of the building of this single vessel, the cost of which is to be limited in the bill; and he not only proposes within that limit to construct the vessel, but he proposes at his own expense to maintain it in its experiments and use for six months after its construction.

For that reason the committee have thought it wise to confine the contract proposed to John Gamgee; but hereafter if the experiments shall prove successful, as I doubt not they will, when other vessels for the same purposes shall become necessary, their construction will of course be open to the fullest measure of competition, or may be built by the Government itself upon the plan that has thus been verified by actual experiment under the direction of Professor John Gamgee.

Whether these reasons may prove satisfactory to the honorable Senator from Kansas or to other Senators, I cannot tell. They are the reasons which have controlled my judgment and that of the committee in recommending the passage of a bill confining the contract to a particular individual.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not question at all the accuracy of the Senator's statement. I do not know that any other person than Professor Gamgee has invented a vessel of this particular kind; but I do know of a number of persons who have applied the same principle to the carrying of meat in cars, and the making of ice by artificial means, and things of that kind.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me one moment, I wish to state an additional fact that he may deal with, which was a consideration with the committee. The main facts controlling our judgment are those which were stated a few moments since, but this additional fact is by no means unworthy of important consideration. It is that if you require this vessel to be advertised for and open to competition, as is usual in regard to the building of naval vessels and other Government work, you fail to get the vessel during the present season. It is very desirable, if we make this experiment at all, that it be made at once. Professor Gamgee has, by his own engineer and two engineers of ability detailed for the purpose by the Navy Department, perfected all the plans and specifications by which this particular vessel is to be constructed. I am assured by Professor Gamgee that this vessel can be ready for actual use within a hundred days, and he says he thinks it is safe to say within ninety from the day the contract is entered into. So much time is lost in entering into a contract, and so much will be lost, especially by advertising for bids and entering into a contract with any other person than with him, who is ready with his plans and specifications to proceed to the work at once, that there is no hope of the construction of this vessel so as to have the benefit of its use during the present season.

It is, in my judgment, a consideration of the highest importance that the vessel be constructed and put in use at once, or at least by the month of July, so that if we find security in it, it gives the results it is believed it will give, we may have its benefits for the coming summer, with the hope that it may avert the dangers with which a large proportion of this country is so seriously threatened. These are the reasons, and I believe the entire reasons, influencing the committee.

Mr. PLUMB. I certainly had no purpose, by the suggestion which I made, of securing such a modification of this bill as would require any delay whatever. I realize as fully as any one can, I think, the necessity for a due degree of haste; but I do think that it is not wise to limit the Secretary of the Treasury to this one person. I do not make a great deal of the fact that that person is not a citizen of the United States; but I do know, and I think there are others on this floor who know, that there are steamers traversing the Atlantic carrying beef in the carcass to foreign ports which is preserved by a system that is regarded as quite as valuable as that of Professor Gamgee; and I do not think that the experience which so far has been applied to this subject has demonstrated that his plan or patent, or whatever it may be, is, to any considerable degree at least, superior to that of a number of others which are in operation. While it may be that he, in anticipation of this legislation, has by some kind of diligence, which possibly may not have been applied by other persons, got himself now in a fair state of readiness to construct a ship, I do not think that consideration alone, or the consideration of the loss of a few days' time, ought to operate to cut out not only other persons, but all other persons, American inventors and others, who may have, as I doubt not many have, plans and patents that are just as valuable as, if not more so than, the person named in this bill.

I do not desire in any way that this matter shall be made the subject of that competitive process or advertisement for bids which the Senator from Tennessee speaks of, and which would undoubtedly occupy valuable time; but I do think that if a few days, or two weeks, or thirty days, or perhaps only ten days, were permitted to intervene, during which time the Secretary of the Treasury might call for plans and specifications and bids—not necessarily public bids, but private bids—it would at least have a certain fairness about it which this bill as it stands does not have. I therefore, without desiring to impede the passage of the bill or seeking in any way to antagonize it, would be glad if the Senator from Tennessee would submit to an amendment which would at least permit the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to avail himself of the ingenuity, of the judgment, of the investigations of other persons, but especially American citizens, practical ship-builders, as is suggested by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] The fact is, that the two things—the building of the ship and the process of refrigerating to be applied therein—do not necessarily go together at all.

While I would not want to express that opinion without due deference to the judgment of the committee which has examined this project and its general purpose, at the same time I do believe that this principle might equally well apply to ships already built in such a way that not only might the time be saved that has been spoken of in reference to this plan of Mr. Gamgee, but that it might be applied a great deal sooner by applying it to a vessel that is now already built. But whether that be true or not, I think that in framing this bill there ought to be a seeming opportunity at any rate for other persons than this gentleman here named to compete, and especially to open it to the citizens of our own country who have applied, as I know many of them have, the best years of their lives to procuring plans of the same kind, plans many of which are now used by the wealthiest cattle-shippers in this country in ships which are carrying carcasses of beef to foreign markets. It is the same principle, no more and no less; and the fact that this person has been a little more diligent in getting his plans, in getting himself probably before the notice of the authorities, should not operate to cut out wholly and entirely, as does this bill, every person from an opportunity of doing this same thing for the same or for a less amount of money.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas propose an amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. I will in a moment.

Mr. MCDONALD. I should like to have this bill go over until the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is in. He is chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. I do not know what evidence Mr. Gamgee has been able to furnish the special committee of the particular excellence of his invention; but I have been informed of experiments made, of which the Senator from New Jersey to whom I have referred has personal knowledge, and am told that it has thus far failed. I am not able to say, of course, of my own knowledge, nor have I consulted with the Senator from New Jersey on the subject. I shall certainly favor the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas—that is, to strike out the name of the contractor in this case and leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury to make this contract under the recommendations of this board of health. I do not see, if it is to be made under their recommendation, why a particular party should be named, thus cutting off all competition. I know there are other persons who claim that they have inventions superior to this, intended to accomplish the same purposes, who desire to compete for it; and I know that some of those persons desire to present their plans to the committees that have this matter in charge.

I hope the bill will stand over until we can learn something more definite in regard to the success of these experiments heretofore made, for I understand that such experiments have been made, and we can learn something of their results. If that is not done, I shall certainly vote for the amendment suggested to leave this to competition under the restrictions then contained in the bill if the name of the party with whom the contract is to be made shall be stricken out and left blank.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to strike out, in line 4, the words "with Mr. John Gamgee" and insert "with a suitable person or persons, upon plans to be submitted, and bids for the construction of the same."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, which will be reported.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is, in line 4, to strike out "with Mr. John Gamgee" and insert:

With a suitable responsible person or persons, upon plans to be submitted, with bids for the construction of the same.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, seeing it announced in the newspapers a few days since that Dr. Thomas J. Turner, medical inspector of the Navy, and Dr. J. B. Hamilton, Surgeon of the United States Marine Hospital Service, and Dr. J. B. Billings, surgeon of the United States Army, were detailed by the President as members of the National Board of Health, I addressed a note to those gentlemen and Dr. Verdi, who had also been nominated for a position on that board, asking their opinion as to the merits of Professor Gamgee's plan of refrigeration as a disinfecting agent for vessels and cargoes. I beg to send to the Clerk's desk their answer, and I ask that it be read for whatever it may be worth, and I will say that the latter name on that paper, Dr. Billings, enjoys as high rank for attainment in sanitary science perhaps as any man of his age in America, possibly as high as any man irrespective of age in this country.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 27, 1879.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 26th instant, requesting that we should give you our opinions as to the merits of Professor John Gamgee's proposed refrigerating steam-vessel as a means of disinfecting vessels and cargoes, we have the honor to report as follows:

First. We have examined the models and the drawings relating to this apparatus; have listened to the explanations given by Professor Gamgee and the engineers who have been engaged with him upon this subject.

Second. We are of the opinion that the apparatus, if properly constructed and managed, will produce a temperature below the freezing point of water, probably as low as zero Fahrenheit.

Third. In an empty ship it is probable that this low temperature can be produced throughout by the refrigerating vessel if sufficient time be allowed for the working of the apparatus.

Fourth. In a ship with a cargo in it it will be more difficult to produce this uniform low temperature, and it is probable that in almost all cases it will be necessary to discharge the cargo before a ship can be properly disinfected by this or any other process.

Fifth. Whether the production of a temperature even as low as zero in a ship for a comparatively short period of time, id est, for a few hours, will destroy or render permanently harmless the yellow-fever poison we do not know, there being no satisfactory evidence in existence upon this point. But from what is known as to the effects of temperature upon this disease we are of opinion that the experiment is worth trying.

Sixth. It will be seen that we consider the project as an experiment; it is in fact impossible to view it otherwise.

But even in the case of failure the results can hardly fail to be of considerable scientific value, while in case of success the cost would be a comparative trifle.

We are, respectfully, &c.,

THOMAS J. TURNER,
Medical Inspector United States Navy, member National Board of Health.
J. B. HAMILTON,
Surgeon United States Marine Hospital Service, Treasury Department.
J. B. BILLINGS,
Surgeon United States Army.

Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS,
Senator and chairman of the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

Mr. GARLAND. There is no doubt that the principle of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas is right and proper to be adopted in ordinary cases; but the case now presented to the Senate is an exceptional case, and one that in my judgment is very clearly taken out of the general rule which would require all these matters to go to competition before the proper officers of the Government. This committee was appointed early in the last session, and very soon after the beginning of its meetings the gentleman whose name is mentioned in the bill, Dr. Gamgee, presented this matter before the committee for its examination, with the proper cuts of the vessel and a detailed and full statement of all that he hoped and expected to accomplish and the purposes that he had in view. This was not a secret presentation, nor was the examination a secret or covert one, but it was open from day to day before the committee, of which the public prints had much to say from time to time. Not until a very few days since did the committee hear from any quarter that the power of this method to accomplish these ends would be questioned by any person. Dr. Gamgee comes before the committee and before the Senate not only with the high indorsement and recommendation contained in the paper which has just been read, but the committee had other and ample and abundant testimony sustaining him in this attempt. The late lamented Dr. Woodworth, whose loss the whole country deplores, indorsed this plan most heartily and fully. The people of New Orleans, a city that is generally the first afflicted if not in the most cases the worst afflicted also by this dire calamity, have sent up a memorial to the committee, which was before them, indorsing and recommending this attempt of Dr. Gamgee.

We are fast approaching the period when it may be too late to accomplish anything in this direction; and if we expect to accomplish anything at all by legislation, we must hasten and place this matter now before the Secretary of the Treasury. To ask him to advertise for bids (which under ordinary circumstances I admit most frankly is the proper and right course to be pursued) would delay this beyond the time that anything can be done in this country to prevent the scourge that we all hope and pray may be averted from our shores.

Now, if Dr. Gamgee stands before the Senate and before the country, according to the interpretation of the Senator from Kansas, in the attitude of having a preference in legislation, it is only that preference at last which skill and industry will always secure; and for one I am not ready to deny him that preference. If he has given birth to this idea, and if he has first started this project, and if out of it one-tenth of the good that he has alleged can be accomplished, he is entitled to any preference the legislation of the country can give him. But let us not delay now what is almost a certainty, from the highest and best testimony we can get, of accomplishing this great end, for an uncertainty at some future period. Leave that matter open. If there is any defect in this legislation or in the project for which this legislation is sought, as the Senator from Tennessee has said, that can be remedied in the future.

Ordinarily the request of the Senator from Indiana would not be resisted for a moment, and neither would the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas; but we are peculiarly situated in this matter and there is no time now to delay, but let us grasp what is within our reach and trust to the future, if there are any defects or difficulties to be remedied in this matter, that they will be remedied by more mature and better legislation afterward.

I have a circular of Dr. John Gamgee, which was before the committee, and which has been published in the public prints, and if it be deemed necessary by any gentleman I shall ask that it be read from the Secretary's desk. I do not wish, however, to consume time with it unless some gentleman asks for it.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask the Senator a question before he resumes his seat. I observe that the bill provides for the construction of a steam steel vessel. Why is that provision made? Haste being important as the Senator has reminded us, why is it proposed that a vessel shall be constructed? Why does not the bill rather provide for a steam-vessel than for the construction of a steam-vessel? Under the bill, I take it the Secretary will be compelled to contract with this or another person for the building, the construction of a vessel. Suppose it turns out that there are numerous vessels adapted to this purpose, on which the apparatus could be put in half the time, half the hundred days alluded to by the Senator from Tennessee, why should we in that respect restrict the proceeding? If it turns out that there is no vessel adapted to this purpose already constructed, then the bill, as I suggest it might be, would still confer the power to contract for the production of a vessel. But it seems to me that if haste be the chief matter here, it would be rather imprudent as provision in that regard to leave the bill as it is now, unless there is some reason which I have not heard mentioned.

Mr. HARRIS. In answer to the question of the Senator from New York, I can only say that Professor Gamgee thinks that by the construction of a steel vessel—and the Senator is quite right in supposing that the bill requires the contract to be for the construction of such a vessel—he will acquire a superior degree of strength and adaptability to the peculiar purpose that no other material will give; and I must say in behalf of Professor Gamgee, having been more or less in contact with him for the last two or three months, that he has impressed me profoundly with the fact that he is vastly more interested in the development of the science, in the accomplishment of the object, than he is in any monetary feature that may be involved in it, vastly more interested in the success of his plan than in the matter of money-getting. In his opinion there is no vessel that can be obtained that is so well adapted for the purpose as the plans that he has matured, with the aid of the engineers of the Navy Department and his own engineer, for the specific purpose intended. It may fail; he may be mistaken; I may be mistaken in supposing that it will be successful; but every scientific man of whom I have heard who has investigated his plans has expressed his faith in them. Dr. Woodworth firmly believed they would be successful. The gentlemen to whom we referred the question a few days ago have had Gamgee and the engineers of the Navy Department before them, and they express faith and say the experiment is well worthy of being tried, even though it may fail.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question, with his permission.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask if the committee have had any evidence before them that Dr. Gamgee has ever practically yet produced the results, or anything like the results, that are proposed to be secured by this bill? I stated before that I had been informed on high authority that an experiment undertaken by Dr. Gamgee as to a section of a refrigerator intended to be used for the exportation of slaughtered beef had proved a failure, and that that fact was known to the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. McPHERSON,] who is now absent. I state this on the information furnished me by a gentleman whom I have known for a good while, and whom I believe to be trustworthy.

Now I want to know if the committee had anything except theory? The report of this medical board of health furnishes us no facts. It gives it as their opinion, from the plans and specifications furnished them by Dr. Gamgee, that the apparatus that he proposes to construct will accomplish certain purposes; but that is a mere matter of opinion. I would give a great deal more for one practical illustration than I would for a great many opinions.

Mr. HARRIS. In answer to the Senator from Indiana I can only say that the committee had before it such evidence as satisfied the committee that Professor Gamgee had produced and maintained for weeks, if not for months, a sheet of three thousand square feet of ice during the spring and early summer-time in one of the parks of London that was used day by day for skating purposes. That fact may be asserted as one established beyond controversy. He asserts with perfect confidence, and as I said a while ago every scientific man that I have heard of who has examined his plan, who has investigated his theory or his method, expresses confidence and faith in his ability to throw into any vessel air at any temperature almost that may be desired, and that he can produce the result of freezing within a very few moments' time.

My own opinion on the subject I do not think would be of any value; but I became reasonably satisfied that he could produce the result. The experiment referred to by the Senator from Indiana in Jersey City is one that I never heard of before, and I think it a little strange that I have not heard of it—yet of course I do not question his statement—because this plan of John Gamgee's has been discussed to my certain knowledge throughout a very broad circle for the last two or three months, and would have been called to the attention of the Senate some time before this but for the fact that there was a bill pending which was to decide the question as to whether the Federal Government would take cognizance at all of this matter of public health or of preventing or endeavoring to prevent the importation and spread of contagious diseases in this country. The bill that was passed by the Senate failed in the House, and having failed of course I had no disposition to ask the Senate to consider this or any other plan of disinfecting vessels engaged in commerce. Within the last hours of the last session a bill passed creating the National Board of Health, and clothing it with some very limited powers. Under the authority of that act, with the hope of additional legislation on the subject, I introduced the bill, referred it to the committee, it was considered in committee, approved unanimously by the committee, and reported back to the Senate with a recommendation that it pass, believing as the committee did, and as I do, that the experiment is pre-eminently worthy of being made.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, in view of the dreadful calamity which overspread so large a portion of our country during the last session, and in the hope that something may be done to mitigate at least if not to suppress it, should it again make its appearance, there is in my opinion an eminent necessity for doing what in our judgment may be right. I think we may afford to do something by way of experiment, because we do not precisely know the best methods of mitigating or preventing it. If we knew them thoroughly, they could be applied without legislation. We are therefore probably called upon to do something by way of experiment; but it seems to me we ought to have a little better information as to what experiments are proposed; and when it is suggested by the Senator from Indiana that a member of this committee, not present in the body to-day, has possession of important information to communicate to us, it would seem strange indeed to me——

Mr. McDONALD. Not of this committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, a member of the Naval Committee. It would seem strange indeed to me if we did not pause and avail ourselves of that information which that Senator is supposed and believed to possess.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Maine allow me?

Mr. HAMLIN. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. But for the extreme pressure as to the matter of time I should not have hesitated one moment, on the statement of the Senator from Indiana, in consenting that the matter go over; and if the Senator from Indiana can now inform me that the Senator to whom he refers will be in his seat to-morrow, I will now consent that it may go over, for I desire all the light that can be thrown upon this question to be developed. I want the Senate to understand the merits of the question, so far as it has merits, fully and entirely; and if I am in error in my judgment about it, I hope to be corrected at the earliest moment possible.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think if the Senator from New Jersey shall not be in his seat until the day after to-morrow, the Senator from Tennessee makes a mistake in attempting to urge the passage of his bill before that period of time.

I want to invite attention, in addition to what has been said by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] to a point of objection in the bill itself; and if the experiments are no better considered than the bill is in relation to the construction of the vessel, I think we may anticipate an entire failure in the beginning. The bill itself is really objectionable, because it seeks to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to contract with a certain individual to construct a vessel. Does he know the block at the top of the mainmast from the kelson of a vessel? Does he know the stem from the stern of a vessel? Does he know the larboard from the starboard side? What knowledge has that man with whom the Secretary is to contract?

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me one moment? The bill does not recite the fact (it has been stated here by myself and others) that the plans for this vessel have been matured by the engineers of the Navy Department of this Government and an engineer of John Gamgee, and those plans will be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury. Those plans can be submitted to every Senator who desires to scrutinize them. They are specific, and can be submitted at any moment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, Mr. President, but when a full draught is made for the construction of a vessel, and full plans of every stick of timber that shall enter into its construction, and it shall be submitted to the Senator from Tennessee, and he shall be the person authorized and directed to make that construction, he does not know how to put any two pieces together.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator observe that the bill provides that it shall be constructed under the supervision of an engineer of the Navy Department?

Mr. HAMLIN. I do understand it precisely so, but it is to be done by an individual who may have no earthly practical knowledge of its construction. He is therefore, in my judgment, the last person in the world with whom a contract should be made. Is promptness desirable? Then will you not go to the ship-yard where suitable vessels are constructed and where all the machinery and appliances are at hand for rapidly constructing work, rather than to this individual who has no capacity for construction whatever.

Now, sir, I am with the Senator from Tennessee; I want to aid him in the passage of his bill, and I want all the haste there can be; but I do not want that haste which shall lead us wrong, and I certainly would correct such errors as, in my judgment, are plain and palpable in the very text of the bill.

Again, it requires the construction of a steel vessel. Why that? It is to be hardly a sea-going vessel. Its location will be mainly in your harbors or along your coast. I do not know, I doubt if any Senator knows, whether there are or not good reasons why it should be constructed of that material. The Senator from Tennessee surely has not informed us. He says it will require a vessel of very considerable strength. More than that which shall navigate the trackless ocean? More than that which shall buffet the storms and the winds that come from a lee shore? Certainly not; nay, not half that?

Now, I am in favor, first, of the amendment which has been submitted by the Senator from Kansas, because it may give you a better vessel, if one is to be built, and in shorter time; but I would qualify that with giving to the Secretary an authority to purchase, if there be a vessel already constructed suited and adapted to this service, and saving the time which is so necessary to the enforcement of such provisions as may be deemed proper by the board of surgeons or physicians which has been created. And my friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] suggests that it might be wise even to authorize the Secretary to charter a vessel and try the experiment with that. It is an experiment, and let us do it as prudently and at the same time let us do it as promptly as possible. I submit that the very line of argument which I have suggested is in the line both of economy and promptness. I should, besides, give to somebody, perhaps to naval officers—they would know well—I should give to some competent body the authority to determine that kind of vessel which would be actually required.

The Navy Department through its engineers may have given this committee plans of steel vessels. We have had no information here that steel vessels are necessary. If they are necessary, I am ready to vote for them, and I am willing to clothe the Secretary of the Treasury with authority to look into the whole matter, and if a steel vessel be necessary then let it be constructed, not by one man, not by a man who has no practical knowledge, but by the best man or body of men who can be found, suitable men, and who will construct it in the most limited period of time.

I insist that I am in the very line and interest of a rapid passage of this measure, and that the course I suggest will sooner put in operation the machinery of a law which has been passed for the preservation of the lives of our own people in the South. I propose to accomplish the object, in my judgment, much quicker than if you take this bill precisely as it is.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I would inquire of the Senator from New Jersey if he can inform me when his colleague will probably be in his seat in the Senate?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have no knowledge on the subject. I understand indirectly that my colleague will be here to-morrow morning, but I have no positive knowledge on the subject.

Mr. HARRIS. In view of that fact——

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator from Tennessee will allow me a moment, I quite concur in a great deal that was said by my colleague, [Mr. HAMLIN,] but there is one suggestion on which I think I shall have to differ from him, and that was as to the Government chartering a vessel for the purpose of trying this experiment. The experience in the war I think uniformly was that the Government in chartering vessels more than paid for them before they got through with them, in some cases paid double or treble what they could have bought the vessels for outright; and if you go and charter vessels now that will be the experience in this case, I have no doubt. Whatever is done, I think the Government had better buy the vessel outright.

I am very heartily in sympathy with the movement which the honorable Senator from Tennessee has in charge, and I do not suppose it can suffer at all from a delay to accommodate the convenience of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I desire to have read, partly in answer to the criticism of the senior Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] a brief communication from the Chief Engineer of the Navy; and when it is read I desire to say now that I will consent that this bill may be informally laid aside until to-morrow. If the Senator from New Jersey is then not in his seat, I am inclined to go the other day that my friend from Maine has suggested to await his return, in order that he may be heard in reference to the matter referred to by the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair.) The communication sent to the desk will be read.

Mr. GARLAND. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that this bill be made the special order after the morning hour on Wednesday for this reason: it is to pass from us to-day anyhow——

Mr. HARRIS. My suggestion was that it go over informally, so that it will remain the regular order. There will be no objection to such an arrangement.

Mr. GARLAND. My purpose was to have it definitely understood that on that day we should dispose of it in some shape, so that the absent Senator from New Jersey and other Senators might take due notice of the fact and be prepared at that time with their suggestions and any amendments they might see proper to offer. I desire to have the amendment of the Senator from Kansas printed, and I feel much rejoiced that the Senator from Maine has given in his adhesion to the general theory of the bill; and I should like to request of him, while he objects to the details of the bill, that he prepare a substitute which will suit his views, and be ready to offer it on that day, so that we may dispose of the subject advisedly and understandingly. The committee have labored from day to day upon this project, and they have given the Senate the best measure they are capable of under the circumstances, with the information they have before them; but as we believe there is a sentiment in the Senate concurring in the general idea that this bill contains, I hope we shall be able, on the day after to-morrow, to mature a plan which will accomplish the purpose that all of us desire.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Arkansas, I thought, intended to answer a question I asked him some time ago. If it is agreeable to him, I should like to hear an answer now.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator will excuse me, but I deferred before to the Senator from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. HARRIS,] who I thought answered the Senator from New York very fully. The answer is also contained in the different documents before the committee, one of which I sent up to the Secretary's desk to be read in case any gentleman not on the committee or who had not examined the subject desired further information. Different gentlemen who have given in their testimony as to their convictions upon this proposition have stated why this should be a steel vessel, and the circular of Dr. Gamgee also states the reasons. Of course it is not expected by the Senator from New York or any other Senator, I take it, that the bill should embody the whys and wherefores of this particular measure in itself. That information is before the Senate, and I ask the Senator from New York to familiarize himself with it by the day after to-morrow. If on that information the committee are mistaken, as a matter of course that can be remedied by the substitute which I hope the Senator from Maine will be ready to offer to the Senate on that day. Personally I am not an adept in this business; I never built any more ships of steel or any other sort than the Senator from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I will try to familiarize myself with any matter on which I am called to vote, but I hope the Senator from Arkansas will forgive me for seeking to avail myself of such knowledge as he has obtained, he being a member of the committee having the particular topic in charge; and I submit to the Senate, it is rather unusual when a question is put to a member of a committee which has had a subject under consideration, to answer that members of the Senate could familiarize themselves in their own way with the matter.

Now, I venture to state once again the question which I should like to hear answered at some time; and although I might ascertain the answer by reading all these papers, still I think it would be convenient if we could receive it from the committee supposed to know more about this subject than the rest of us do. Perhaps I had better say, although I think it is hardly necessary for any Senator to say, that I will vote willingly for any plan likely in a reasonable way to try even a rational experiment to antidote the tendency to pestilence in certain quarters and at certain seasons; and now if the Senator from Arkansas will give me his attention for one moment, or the Senator from Tennessee, I will endeavor to state what I should like to know.

As I understand it, it is proposed to send to a given harbor, or the quarantine ground of a given harbor, a vessel carrying apparatus by which atmosphere can be chilled below the freezing point and injected into an arriving ship. That is the plan, is it not? I should like to understand why it is that any vessel staunch and capacious cannot carry the chemical apparatus—for such I must infer this to be—by which the air is to be chilled and poured into the coming ship. If it is true that great strength of vessel is required so that steel must be employed, and if it is true that such unusual shape or dimensions are required that none of the vessels afloat are adapted to this service, it is very easy for the Senators who have investigated the matter to tell us so. Left to more general intelligence, I should suppose that if it was wished to try such an experiment, and to try it promptly, the business-like way would be to look for a vessel large enough and strong enough to carry the apparatus to be employed, and having found her, either by purchase or charter to get possession of her for the required length of time, and try the experiment. That is the way it would appear to persons only commonly, perhaps not even commonly, informed on such a subject. There may be reasons why we should pass a bill directing the construction of a vessel, laying a new keel, and building a vessel up on purpose in order to try, during a spring which has already begun, this experiment; but it seems to me rather odd, and so I venture once more to ask the honorable Senator from Arkansas not to be so stingy of the information which he possesses, but to let his light so shine that we may all understand why this is.

Mr. GARLAND. "Turn on the lights!"

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, turn on so much of the light, or let out so much of the dark, as the Senator may prefer. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

Mr. HARRIS. I sent a paper to the Secretary's desk which has not been read. I desire to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The communication sent to the desk by the Senator from Tennessee will be reported by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CHIEF ENGINEER'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES NAVY-YARD,
Washington, February 26, 1879.

I hereby certify that Mr. John A. Svedberg has been engaged since the 1st of January, and Mr. Augustus A. Bostrom during the current month of February, preparing the plans of Professor John Gamgee's steel refrigerating ship in conjunction with Mr. W. E. Sudlow, who is Mr. Gamgee's engineer.

Every effort has been made to secure perfect working drawings, and to check the data and calculations on which the important work of purifying ships depends. The result has been to inspire me with confidence, as well as those who have had an opportunity of following Mr. Gamgee's work. The designs have been most carefully considered, and whatever may be the effect of purifying by cold and antiseptic solutions, it is certain that the ship and machinery will be of a substantial and excellent type.

JOHN W. MOORE,
Chief Engineer United States Navy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. EATON. I hope the matter will go over.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggested that I consented that the further consideration of the bill might go over until to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. Why not move it?

Mr. HARRIS. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the chairman of the democratic caucus, and the chairman of the executive committee of the democratic caucus, and the chairman of the subcommittee of the executive committee of the democratic caucus have nothing to propose to us, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EATON. If my friend would strike out his preamble no doubt we should accept his motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I accept the amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. We can vote on the preamble in executive session.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KERNAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FERRY. Will not the Senator from New York modify his motion and move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. KERNAN. I think that the motion that was made for that purpose was hardly fair or respectful to a large number of Senators on this floor, and I am not inclined to vote for such a motion now.

Mr. FERRY. Does the Senator from New York allude to my motion? I offered no preamble. I ask the Senator from New York to modify his motion to a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. KERNAN. I think we can do that to-morrow. If any gentleman shall move it then without a preamble, which seemed to be designedly offensive, I shall vote for it; but not now.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator will allow——

Mr. KERNAN. I insist on the motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I withdraw the preamble at the request of my friend from New York.

Mr. COCKRELL. The motion is not debatable. Let us have a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair supposed such a motion was not debatable; but he supposes he must be mistaken, or experienced Senators would not persist in debating it. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and forty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 1, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM GEORGIA.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I ask that the oath of office be administered to my colleague, [Mr. JOHN B. GORDON,] a Senator-elect from the State of Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator-elect will please come forward for that purpose.

Mr. GORDON advanced to the Vice-President's desk, escorted by Mr. HILL, of Georgia, and the oath prescribed by the act of July 11, 1868, having been administered to him he took his seat in the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, reported an amendment to be proposed by that committee to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 1) to repeal certain clauses in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD. I also report back for re-reference the joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, in favor of such legislation as will forever prohibit the payment by the General Government of the southern war claims, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. PADDOCK. It should properly go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONSIDERATION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and they hereby are, directed to report an amendment to the rules of the Senate, which shall provide that the several committees shall receive the estimates and report the annual appropriation bills as hereinafter named.

First. The Committee on Appropriations; bills for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for all deficiencies, and for sundry civil expenses.

Second. The Committee on Military Affairs; the bills for the support of the Army, the Military Academy, and for fortifications.

Third. The Committee on Naval Affairs; the bills for the support of the Navy and the Naval Academy.

Fourth. The Committee on Foreign Relations; the bills for diplomatic and consular expenses, and for carrying out the treaties of the United States with foreign countries.

Fifth. The Committee on Indian Affairs; the bills for the expenses of the Indian department.

Sixth. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads; the bills for the expenses of the Post-Office Department, and mail transportation by land or sea.

Seventh. The Committee on Commerce; the bills for the improvement of harbors and rivers, and construction and repair of light-houses.

Eighth. The Committee on the District of Columbia; the bills for the expenses and support of the District of Columbia.

Ninth. The Committee on Pensions; the bills for the payment of pensions.

Tenth. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; bills for such public buildings and grounds as the needs of the Government may require.

Eleventh. The Committee on Agriculture; the bill for the expenses of the Department of Agriculture.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to this resolution?

Mr. BLAINE. The resolution read I think like an absolute instruction to the Committee on Rules to report a rule of that sort.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does so read.

Mr. HOAR. Let the first clause be read again.

Mr. ROLLINS. I have no objection to modifying the resolution.

Mr. BLAINE. If it is a mere direction to inquire into the expediency of reporting such an amendment to the rules, I suppose nobody will object to it.

Mr. ROLLINS. I will modify the resolution to meet the views of the Senator from Maine, so as to direct the committee to inquire into the expediency of reporting such an amendment to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be modified in that way, and as thus modified it will be printed and referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Do I understand that the resolution is to be printed and sent to the Committee on Rules? Is that the order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That was the order.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to know whether it directs the Committee on Rules to report a rule of that kind, or whether it requires them to inquire into the expediency of doing so.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution was modified so as to require them to inquire into the expediency of so amending the rules.

Mr. WITHERS. I think it would be well enough to make an addition to the proposition so as to dispense with the Committee on Appropriations.

JOINT RULES.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I propose to offer a resolution looking to the re-establishment of joint rules between the two Houses. Previous to that, however, I should like to have read from the desk something that I find in the Manual of Rules prepared by the late Chief Clerk. I will ask the Secretary to read the introductory matter down to the joint rules as printed in the Manual.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the part desired by the Senator from West Virginia.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The joint rules which heretofore governed in the transaction of business between the two Houses are, including the twenty-second joint rule, which was abrogated by the act of Congress of January 29, 1877, regulating the manner of counting the electoral votes for President and Vice-President, inserted in this compilation for the purpose of information, with the following explanatory remarks:

A question having been raised in the Senate at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, whether the joint rules of the two Houses did not require for their enforcement the concurrence of both Houses in their readoption, the Senate, on the 20th of January, 1876, passed and sent to the House of Representatives the following resolution:

"Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress, excepting the twenty-second joint rule, be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses for the present session."

To this resolution the House made no response, but, on the 14th of August, 1876, as had been usual at the close of a session, sent to the Senate for its concurrence a resolution to suspend the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules; upon which the Senate passed and sent to the House the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the resolution of the House of Representatives presented this day in the following words: 'Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules be suspended for the remainder of the session,' be respectfully returned to the House of Representatives, with the statement that as the House of Representatives has not notified the Senate of the adoption of the joint rules for this present session, as proposed by the resolution of the Senate of the 20th day of January last, and transmitted to the House on the 22d day of the same month, there are no joint rules in force."—(Constitution, Rules, and Manual, pages 181, 182.)

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I offer now the following resolution, to be referred to the Committee on Rules, or to be passed at once if there be no objection to it:

Whereas differences of opinion in regard to the effect of a final adjournment of Congress on the joint rules governing the transactions of business between the two Houses of Congress have heretofore existed, and it is desirable that an agreement between the two Houses be had: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules of the Senate be authorized to consider the whole subject-matter; also to take into consideration the expediency of excepting appropriation bills from the operation of the sixteenth and seventeenth of said joint rules; and to confer with the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives, with a view to joint action thereon.

Resolved, That this resolution be communicated to the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from West Virginia will take off his preamble, I have no objection to the present adoption of the resolution instructing our Committee on Rules to inquire into the subject of joint rules and to confer with the House. But the preamble recites what I do not understand to be the correct state of the fact, so far as the Senate is concerned, and, to the extent that we have any official notice, so far as the House is concerned. Very likely the House of Representatives sent us the last resolution that they did upon the subject of suspension through the inadvertence of some member, attention not having been called to the state of the case, which very often happens in this body even. I dare say but for the fact that attention was called here, by accident almost, to that resolution of the House of Representatives, the Senate would have concurred in the suspension of joint rules that the Senate had almost unanimously, and I do not know but quite unanimously, decided did not exist. Therefore I should be entirely unable to agree to the preamble in the precise form in which it is put. The object of the Senator can be attained by offering the resolution simply without the preamble, changing it so as to direct the Committee on Rules to inquire into the subject of joint rules and to confer with the House. If my honorable friend is willing to do that, I shall not object to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think it is a fact that there is a difference between the two Houses as to whether or not the joint rules now exist. Believing that to be so, and understanding that a former House of which I have a right to speak, so construed it, I am hardly prepared to have the preamble stricken out. I believe it states what is substantially correct, and as the resolution only directs an inquiry and the preamble can do no harm as it stands, I should much prefer that the resolution should go to the House of Representatives as it now stands. However, if there are serious objections to the preamble, and if Senators on both sides of the Chamber think the preamble had better not go with the resolution, I shall not specially insist upon it; but I prefer the whole resolution just as it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from West Virginia I think has forgotten that at the very last session of the last Congress, when the day of final adjournment is fixed by law and the Constitution combined, the House of Representatives did not entertain any idea that there were any joint rules in existence, the sixteenth and seventeenth for instance, because the House of Representatives, without proposing to suspend those ancient rules, sent to us down to within ten or fifteen minutes of twelve o'clock—(and I believe the clock had to be moved back even to do that)—continually a stream of bills and joint resolutions. Therefore I do not wish to have this body agree to anything which assumes or implies, recognizes or asserts, that either body understands the ancient joint rules to be in existence. This body certainly did not so understand, and by a vote which as I say was practically unanimous.

Consequently I hope that the honorable Senator, if he desires to have the matter inquired into, to which I have no objection, will withdraw his preamble. As it is drawn it implies that there is a difference of opinion in this body which, after debate, so far as I remember it, did not exist; and inasmuch as the preamble is of no consequence to the effective object the Senator has in view, would it not be better to allow the committee to consider the subject without any committal of any sort?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is plain that joint rules in some form should exist between the two Houses. If the Senator from Vermont is right, then no joint rule has existed since the Forty-fourth Congress, and whatever may have taken place between the two Houses as to conference committees, the exchange of bills, and the other things which make it necessary that the two Houses should understand one another, has gone on by general consent without any joint rule whatever between the two Houses. I am anxious that joint rules between the two Houses should be re-established, or that the question of re-establishing them should at least be taken into consideration. It is important for the business of Congress to have joint rules. That is the primary motive I have in bringing forward the present resolution.

As to the preamble, now that the attention of the Senate and of the House will be called to the matter, I have no special objection, unless some Senator has and can present a view other than the one I have presented, to taking the course which the Senator from Vermont suggests.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The preamble is withdrawn, and the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. One moment. The trouble about it, of course, is that the other party to joint rules, so to speak, is incapable of contracting for a continuity of rules. The Senate being a continuous body, has its own rules, which are not varied by adjournment; but as it has been ruled in the House of Representatives over and over again that the rules of the House do not hold from one Congress to another, except on the general presumption that they take the rules of the nearest analogous body, of course, still less could it hold as to joint rules. I think it has now become the settled conviction at both ends of the Capitol that no joint rule can be considered as binding upon the two branches, unless it has been agreed upon by both branches for that particular Congress. If the preamble was left off, the Senator from West Virginia will observe that the resolution should read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules of the Senate be authorized to consider the whole subject of joint rules between the two Houses.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Of course if the preamble is left out, the resolution, to read properly, would have to be so modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As thus modified the resolution is agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the preamble to be withdrawn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is withdrawn.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, I cannot let this occasion pass without giving my dissent to what the Senator from Vermont has said. He asserts the fact that it is conceded by both Houses that there are no joint rules. It certainly has escaped his attention that the present Speaker of the House of Representatives some time ago from his place as Speaker ruled upon that very question, and asserted in the most emphatic terms that the joint rules of the two Houses were in existence.

Mr. BLAINE. How, then, if the Senator will permit me a question, does the Speaker (if the Senator is alluding to what took place in the last Congress) reconcile that with the fact that he allowed the House to pass hundreds of bills on the last two days of the session, utterly regardless of the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules? The Speaker himself, by his own example, which is worthy to be quoted in parliamentary matters, showed plainly that he did not hold to the construction that there were any joint rules in force, because the House violated that understanding right along for the last three days of the session.

Mr. HEREFORD. There is no trouble about that. That is not an answer to the proposition I stated. The fact still exists, and cannot be successfully denied, that the Speaker of the present House at a former session distinctly ruled that the joint rules of the bodies were in existence. He made that ruling positively. It certainly could not have escaped the attention either of the Senator from Vermont or the Senator from Maine that this very question was one of the questions that entered into the consideration of the creation of the electoral commission. This very question was then discussed. The democratic party on one side asserted that by virtue of the joint rules between the two Houses on the subject of counting the electoral votes there was no necessity for an electoral commission, the other side holding the opposite.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will allow me, I wish to say that I did not understand such to have been the theory of the electoral bill at all. I do not remember that there was anybody in either House that opposed a provision by law on the ground that the twenty-second joint rule, if that was the old number of it, was in force at that time.

Mr. HEREFORD. I recollect very well, although I have not had occasion to refer directly to the debate, that the late Senator from Indiana, Mr. Morton, discussed that very proposition at some length.

But I did not rise to enter into any discussion on this subject, but to express my dissent from the statement of the Senator from Vermont, that it was a conceded fact in both Houses that there were no joint rules in existence. The present Speaker of the House has taken the position that a joint rule having been formed by the consent of two distinct bodies it could not be abrogated without the concurrence of the two bodies, or at least that there should be some conference between the two bodies on that subject; and that has been the custom heretofore. The precedent has been that when either body desired to change, modify, or abrogate a joint rule, its resolution read something like this: Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) that certain joint rules are hereby abrogated or are hereby amended. I happened last night accidentally, in reading on another matter, to see a resolution that was introduced, I believe by Mr. Hunter, of Virginia, and no one was a better parliamentarian than he was, and that was the form of the resolution that he introduced, which was a concurrent resolution asking the consent of the other House that such and such a joint rule should be abrogated, amended, repealed, or modified.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to one fact which has some bearing on this matter.

Mr. HEREFORD. Allow me one moment further. I understand the Senator from Maine to say—but I may have misunderstood him—that the rules of the House of Representatives fell when the House adjourned. If I am not very much mistaken, when the Senator from Maine was Speaker of that House and I had the honor of being a member of it, he distinctly ruled, when the question was brought up, that the rules of a prior Congress, so far as the House of Representatives was concerned, did bind the succeeding House unless that House undertook to use its power under the Constitution to change or repeal them. Such a ruling was distinctly made by the Senator from Maine, who then filled the chair of Speaker of the House of Representatives with such distinguished ability. I believe in that I am not mistaken.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator is correct in his statement with a slight amendment. When the revision of the rules was made by the House of Representatives in 1860, which was quite an epoch in the rules of the House, a provision was inserted that the rules of this House should be the rules of each succeeding House. The point was made that that declaration continued them as the rules, but I have never known a Speaker of the House to rule that that declaration had the least force or that its absence would have made any difference. What has been held by the gentlemen who have occupied the chair has been that in the absence of an existing House adopting rules, instead of falling back on what has been loosely termed general parliamentary law, and I never knew any gentleman yet who was able to determine what that was, the House fell back on the rules of the nearest analogous body pending any discussion on new rules, and the nearest analogous body was the preceding House. That has been uniformly held by persons holding the chair of the House.

But on the question immediately at issue I desire to call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to the fact that no matter what the occupant of the last chair ruled, this is now his conduct: that at the close of the late session the two branches proceeded without the slightest regard to joint rules, and especially to Rules 16 and 17, which have particular relevancy to closing business. It is not an argument in the House to say that a rule is void because the House may not choose to notice it, for the Speaker is not called upon in the House to notice a violation of a rule unless the point of order is made that the rule is violated. But the honorable Vice-President, who has had experience in the House, will bear me out in saying that it is the uniform custom and duty of the Speaker, without a motion being made or notice being made on the floor, himself to check the violation of a joint rule because he stands as a representative of the courtesy between the two branches. When you come to a joint rule it has been always held differently from the rules of the House as to devolving duties on the Speaker of the House. Many things are done in the House against the letter of the rules of the House because no point of order is made adverse; but if the Chair is watchful and discharging his duty nothing is permitted to be done contrary to a joint rule, because he stands, as I have already said, as the representative of the courtesy and the amenity of the two branches and cannot permit a violation of the rules that are agreed upon jointly. Therefore so careful an occupant as was the Speaker of the last House I am sure never could have regarded the joint rules as in force when he sat in his chair the last few days of the session and saw the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules perpetually violated. He waived all idea of joint rules; and, as the Senator from Vermont reminds me, after we sent our resolution over, they having sent a counter proposition here proposing the adoption of the joint rules, they waived the idea that they were then in force, because they proceeded to send here new bills as if there was no resolution in the way.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to remind the Senator from West Virginia and also to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the question of the existence of the joint rules was raised in the Forty-fourth Congress in December, 1876, by the then Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON,] on which the then occupant of the chair ruled. The decision of the Chair [Mr. FERRY] was that there were no joint rules in force. An appeal was taken by the Senator from North Carolina from that ruling, and the Chair was sustained by the Senate by the very emphatic vote of 50 to 4, the Senate holding that the joint rules were not operative.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no question before the Senate, for the resolution was agreed to long since.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I desire to have the resolution read as amended so that we may know how it stands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules of the Senate be authorized to take into consideration the whole subject-matter of the joint rules between the two Houses, also to take into consideration the expediency of excepting appropriation bills from the operation of the sixteenth and seventeenth of said joint rules, and to confer with the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives with a view to joint action thereon.

Resolved, That this resolution be communicated to the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That resolution is not at all in the shape that it ought to be, and I am very glad the Senator from West Virginia has called attention to it. The resolution has been so now modified by the Secretary as to make it assume in the body of the resolution exactly what and more than the preamble did. The resolution there recognizes the existence of joint rules and proposes to get rid of the effect of two of them. That is not the thing at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suppose after going to the desk that the Senator from Vermont would see something in it that he probably thought ought to be changed; and taking the view of it he does, I think myself it would be well to have a change made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to the Senator from West Virginia for stating that, because the resolution does not express my opinion or that of the Senate the last time we had a vote upon the question.

Now I move to amend the resolution by striking out in the first part the word "the" where it occurs before "joint," and then by striking out "also to take into consideration the expediency of excepting appropriation bills from the operation of rules sixteenth and seventeenth of said joint rules," so that it will read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules of the Senate be authorized to take into consideration the whole subject-matter of joint rules between the two Houses and to confer.

That covers the whole matter.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think the Senator and I probably can agree on the latter part of it in regard to appropriation bills. My view was that if we excepted appropriation bills from the operation of joint rules 16 and 17, then perhaps there would be no necessity for suspending those rules at the end of the session, and we should get practical legislation and prevent a great deal that might otherwise occur at the end of the session. The Senator himself, I think, will admit that appropriation bills ought to be excepted from those rules, and my impression has been that that is the cause of the House or Senate asking to have the rules suspended at the end of the session, and there would be no necessity for suspending them if appropriation bills were excepted from those two rules.

Now I hope the Senator will withdraw his amendment as to that part of my resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The purpose of my amendment as to that part was merely to escape the implication of the statement that there were any such rules in existence. Now the attention of the committee being called by this discussion to the point the Senator from West Virginia has in mind, their full powers will cover all that for consideration.

I agree with him that the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules as they were, were of the greatest possible consequence, and like a great many other things of the greatest possible consequence, like the Ten Commandments, they were always violated. I endeavored at the beginning of the last session in December to have the Committee on Rules of this body report two rules for the government of the two Houses on that precise subject that was embraced in the old sixteenth and seventeenth, but I did not have the good fortune apparently to get the good opinion of the committee to that proposition, and we never got any report that I know of; and then I had to fall back upon the rules of the Senate, which require three readings on three separate days of bills and joint resolutions, and I accordingly objected to the second reading of every bill in order to stop the infinite mischiefs that we all know occur on the last three days. Now if this amendment is agreed to the committee will have the whole subject in consideration without any limitation, and can make such provision as is necessary.

As I say, my only objection to the clause is that it recognizes the very fact which the Senate almost unanimously by a concurrence of gentlemen of both parties has after discussion decided not to be true.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to the Senator that I think that can be avoided, and I have no objection to avoiding it, by saying "the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules as they formerly existed," or something of that kind. I think it ought to go to the House that the Senate think it unwise, unless it is in the case of appropriation bills, to suspend the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules at the end of the session. I would much prefer my resolution remaining in substance as I introduced it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have modified my amendment so that instead of its saying "said joint rules" it reads "the former joint rules."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now let it be read as modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules of the Senate be authorized to take into consideration the whole subject-matter of joint rules between the two Houses, also to take into consideration the expediency of excepting appropriation bills from the operation of the sixteenth and seventeenth of the former joint rules, and to confer with the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives with a view to joint action thereon.

Resolved, That this resolution be communicated to the House of Representatives.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As it stands in that way I have no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Neither have I.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resolutions as just reported? The Chair hears none and they are agreed to. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the resolutions, as amended and passed, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REFRIGERATING VESSEL FOR DISINFECTION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. No. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB,] which will be reported.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is, in line 4, to strike out "with Mr. John Gamgee," and insert:

With a suitable responsible person or persons, upon plans to be submitted, with bids for the construction of the same.

Mr. HARRIS. I am instructed by the Select Committee on Epidemic Diseases to offer a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, and I desire to say before offering the amendment that at the time the committee had this bill under consideration the committee had no knowledge as to when the Board of Health would be nominated and confirmed or as to when it might be in session. Therefore it felt bound to take its action independent of that Board of Health. Hence the bill was reported as it now stands. I am informed this morning that the Board of Health is now in the city of Washington, and will be this evening, or certainly by to-morrow morning, in session. In view of that fact, the committee have instructed me to move to strike out in line 4, after the word "contract," all down to and including the words "United States," in line 6, and to insert in lieu of these words what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee, on behalf of the Committee on Epidemic Diseases, offers a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, which will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the word "contract," strike out the following words:

With Mr. John Gamgee for the construction of a steel refrigerating steam-vessel, to be used at the quarantine of such of the ports of the United States—

And in lieu thereof insert:

For the purchase or construction of such steam-vessel and refrigerating machine or machines, or to arrange with the Navy Department for the use of such vessel as may be recommended by the National Board of Health to disinfect vessels and cargoes from ports suspected of infection with yellow fever or other contagious disease, the construction of the same, if such construction shall be recommended by said Board of Health, to be under the inspection of an officer of the Bureau of Steam Engineering of the Navy, who may, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands this to be an amendment to the bill as well as to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRIS. The Clerk read the second amendment as well as the first. The first amendment I proposed was in lieu of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question will be first on that, and it will be reported separately. In place of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, the Senator from Tennessee moves what will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, strike out after the word "contract" the words:

With Mr. John Gamgee for the construction of a steel refrigerating steam-vessel, to be used at the quarantine of such of the ports of the United States.

And in lieu thereof, insert:

For the purchase or construction of such steam-vessel and refrigerating machine or machines, or to arrange with the Navy Department for the use of such vessel.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on this substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee proposes a further amendment to the bill.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, in line 10, to strike out "said vessel," and insert—

Of the same if such construction shall be recommended by said Board of Health.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 14, I move to insert after the word "such," the words "purchase or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that this bill be read as amended before we act upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported as amended.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as amended, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized to contract for the purchase or construction of such steam-vessel and refrigerating machine, or machines, or to arrange with the Navy Department for the use of such vessel, as may be recommended by the National Board of Health, to disinfect vessels and cargoes from ports suspected of infection with yellow fever or other contagious disease; the construction of the same, if such construction shall be recommended by said Board of Health, to be under the inspection of an officer of the Bureau of Steam Engineering of the Navy, who may, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, be detailed by the Secretary of the Navy for that purpose; and for the purpose of such purchase or construction, the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be immediately available, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. EATON. If I understand this—I have some doubt whether I do or not—this Board of Health is to determine in regard to the vessel and its construction. I am not ready to admit that the Board of Health is the proper board or that its members are the proper persons to determine with regard to the construction of a vessel. Last night I had a conversation with a man of very high acquirements in all these matters, and he says from his own knowledge—and I have no doubt he has full knowledge of the principles of Mr. Gamgee's system—he has not the slightest doubt that a ship of fifteen hundred or two thousand tons can be fitted at an expense of $5,000 to carry out the ideas of this gentleman and make the experiment either a success or a failure. If this be so, I do not see the necessity in the first place for giving the Board of Health the power to construct or recommend the purchase of a vessel. I have yet to learn that a very distinguished surgeon who may be attached to a board of health is at all the proper man to determine as to a proper vessel on which to place the machinery necessary to carry out this purpose. I do not like the bill in that respect. I have no doubt myself, from what I learned last night, that an expenditure of $50,000 is as well as $200,000 to carry out this experiment, for it is an experiment at the best.

I shall be willing to vote for a proper bill of this character when that bill can be brought before the Senate, but with this understanding, certainly so far as I am concerned, that this is exceptional legislation; for I am not in favor and would not vote for this bill at all if it was to be used hereafter as a precedent for enacting other and general legislation.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, the construction of the vessel which is proposed is admitted to be an experiment, and whether the details of the construction of that vessel are such as to strike favorably a practical ship-builder is not to my mind a question for consideration by the Senate. It is rather to be regarded in the light of a chemical or philosophical instrument for the purpose of generating the agents which are relied upon to produce that degree of cold in infected vessels which it is believed will destroy the germs of contagion. That is all of it; it is nothing more and nothing less.

Now, my own conviction is that this gentleman, Mr. Gamgee, who has devoted more time and attention to the investigation and study of this question than any other man probably living, together with the National Board of Health, who have been selected from their peculiar fitness for the position as sanitarians—that the combined knowledge of these two parties is more to be relied upon as furnishing a means adequate to secure the result desired than the opinion of any other parties that can possibly be secured in this case.

The question for the Senate to consider, it appears to me, is whether sufficient reasons have been or may be adduced before this body to satisfy them that the chances for a successful experiment are sufficient to warrant the expenditure of the money asked. It is of course entirely unknown what the result will be further than this, that we have some ground for judging by the fact that it is admitted by all scientists, by all who have investigated this matter of epidemic diseases, and especially in reference to yellow fever, that a degree of temperature below the freezing point is fatal to the germs which propagate that disease, whatever the nature of those germs may be, because it is well known everywhere that as soon as we have a freezing temperature in any locality where yellow fever prevails as an epidemic, it disappears instantaneously and is no longer propagated. Therefore it is fair, I think, to assume that this fact alone is sufficient to establish the theory upon which the construction of this vessel is asked, that if it is possible to secure by artificial means such a temperature as will destroy the germs of disease existing in an infected vessel, thereby we shall destroy all chance of contagion from that vessel. It seems to me that this fact is sufficient to justify a much larger expenditure even than that which is now asked, and therefore I cannot conceive what harm can result from an investigation which will prove so much, and which at the last cannot exceed in cost the sum of $200,000; and I would call the attention of my friend from Connecticut to the fact that if a less sum is found to be adequate to secure the purpose desired, that less sum will be expended. They are authorized to expend $200,000 or so much of it as may be necessary, and under the control of these experienced sanitarians, I am very willing and anxious to see the experiment made and the effect tested by actual results.

Mr. EATON. I listen to my friend from Virginia always with a great deal of pleasure; but it is my misfortune to disagree with him entirely in this particular in regard to these distinguished sanitarians. It is the duty of these sanitarians, these distinguished medical men about whom we speak, to determine what? To determine what is necessary in order to disinfect a vessel of fifteen hundred tons or two thousand tons. To determine what pipes may be used? No. To determine how much pressure will be necessary? No; for they cannot determine that. That is to be done by a practical machinist or a practical constructor. It is impossible that the Surgeon-General of the Navy can have any information which would enable him to construct a vessel properly. He could state what he wanted; he could state that which was necessary, that pipes should be carried into this or that part of the vessel; but it would require another class of talent, in my judgment, to determine the necessary pressure that should be brought to bear in order to carry this disinfecting agent all over the vessel; and therefore I object to the power which is given by this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Is not the National Board of Health the proper tribunal to determine what character of agent shall be used for this experiment for disinfecting vessels?

Mr. EATON. I should hope, in answer to my friend's inquiry, that they would so inform themselves, by means of Professor Gamgee or somebody else, that they would determine the matter.

Mr. HARRIS. But is not the Board of Health the proper tribunal to determine the character of the experiments they will make in this direction?

Mr. EATON. If my friend wishes an answer to that, so far as the amount of this disinfecting agent is necessary, very well. What does this Board of Health know with regard to the power necessary to send this disinfecting agent throughout a vessel? Nothing. That must come from somebody else. I understand that a steel vessel was first required. Why a steel vessel unless it must be a vessel of uncommon strength? There is no such thing on the water. There have been steel-clad vessels, but most of them were not seaworthy. Now, I submit that this Board of Health is not the board, they are not the men, to determine the necessity of the strength of the vessel.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask my friend if that is not provided for under the bill through the agency of the engineer officer under whose supervision it is to be built?

Mr. EATON. I did not so hear the bill read. I gave all the attention possible, but perhaps I am mistaken in regard to it.

Mr. WITHERS. The engineer officer attends to that.

Mr. EATON. He is required to have something to do, but he is not to supervise, as I understand.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Connecticut is quite right. The Secretary of the Treasury is to contract for the purchase or the construction, or arrange with the Navy Department for the use, of such vessel as the National Board of Health shall recommend for the experiment. If it is to be constructed, that construction is to be under the inspection of an engineer of the Navy Department. That is the exact provision of the bill.

Mr. EATON. My friends from Tennessee and Virginia will both agree that a mere reading at the desk hardly gives one a thorough understanding of the details. In my judgment, in the first place, there is no necessity for this $200,000.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to say to him in regard to that, it is to be presumed that the Board of Health and the Secretary of the Treasury will be guided by a proper sense of economy in whatever action they may take in reference to this and all other matters falling within their jurisdiction. Now, the sum of $200,000 is named as the maximum amount, but if the Board of Health shall recommend, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall arrange with the Navy Department for the use of a vessel that will answer the purpose, and $5,000 shall be sufficient to furnish the refrigerating machine and to place it in that vessel and to make the experiment, is it to be presumed that the $200,000 or any other amount beyond the sum absolutely necessary to make the experiment is to be expended? But we do not know what may be necessary. We may have to construct a vessel, and we may have to construct a steel vessel for the purpose of making this experiment, and in that event $200,000, in all human probability, will be necessary, and if it is, for one I desire that the $200,000 shall be allowed.

Mr. EATON. I desire that all shall be done here which is necessary, and nothing more. I have learned heretofore that if you say "not to exceed $200,000" the expenditure will be about $199,900. My friend from Tennessee will agree with me that we had better guard this thing here. This is the time to do it. I have no doubt, I have no sort of question, that the Navy Department can furnish the vessel, and that all the machinery necessary for this purpose can be put into that vessel for $20,000. I am so informed by men in whose judgment I have perfect reliance, and therefore I will not vote for this bill when it gives anybody the power to construct a steel vessel, which is entirely unnecessary, in my judgment. Therefore I will not vote for $200,000 and give power to anybody to construct a steel vessel. I think we had better guard this thing now rather than wait until after the money is taken; for mark you, give them the power to expend $200,000, and they will do it before they get through.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. EATON. I suggest to my friend, if he is going to give anybody the power to construct this vessel, whether it had not better be a naval constructor, rather than an engineer in the Navy?

Mr. HARRIS. I regret that I cannot adopt the suggestion of my friend from Connecticut. I should be glad to do so if I could, but I think we have placed the power exactly where it should be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope the title will not stand as it is.

Mr. HARRIS. I was about to suggest an amendment to the title by inserting after the word "construction" the words "or purchase."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not cover the case of obtaining the use of a naval vessel.

Mr. HARRIS. Perhaps not. The words "and for other purposes" ought to be added.

The title was so amended as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the purchase or construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes, and for other purposes."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the next bill on the Calendar of general orders.

The SECRETARY. The bill (S. No. 227) to provide that the principal officers of each of the Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has that bill been referred?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask that it further lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That course will be pursued.

BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The yellow-fever bill having been passed, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution I had the honor to offer on the first or second day of the session regarding the disposition of business.

Mr. HARRIS. I rise simply to ask the Senator from Vermont if it will meet his view as well to allow us to have a brief executive session? There are two members of the Board of Health whose nominations have not yet been acted on that I should like very much to have disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend ought not to have said that, I suggest to him. The Senate will either agree to this resolution I have offered, or it will not. It is not a matter about which there need be any debate. It will not take five minutes to dispose of it in some way. I move to take it up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the necessity for the present special session of Congress has been occasioned by the failure of the last Congress to make appropriations for the support of the Army and for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year; and

Whereas the business and other public interests of the country will be best promoted by confining legislation at this session to making provision for the objects aforesaid, and by an early adjournment: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That all bills and joint resolutions, excepting those for the aforesaid purposes, shall be referred to appropriate committees and not reported until the next December session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will allow us to dispose of this resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall be very ready to consider it after the executive session. I insist on my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at two o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 1, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS was agreed to.

PRINTING STATUTES IN REFERENCE TO ELECTIONS, ETC.

Mr. ATKINS. I have prepared a resolution which I will ask to have read. The House can take such action on it as it chooses.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House cause to be printed for the use of the House, in document form, title 26 of the Revised Statutes, embracing the sections in reference to the elective franchise, and also chapter 7 of title 70, embracing the sections in reference to crimes against the elective franchise and the civil rights of citizens; and that the sections and parts of sections thereof which it is proposed to repeal by provisions in the pending Army, and legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bills be printed in italics.

Mr. ATKINS. It is desirable to have these matters printed for convenient reference by members.

Mr. CONGER. Let the gentleman also include the two sections regarding the test oath of jurors which it is proposed to repeal.

Mr. ATKINS. I have no objection to that, and I modify the resolution accordingly.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the legislative appropriation bill contains any other legislative provisions not named in this resolution and of which we are not apprised, I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will include them in this order.

Mr. ATKINS. I should have no objection; but I think that with the addition suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] the resolution now embraces everything of that kind.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I suggest that if this printing is to be done it should be done forthwith, in order to be of any practicable service.

The SPEAKER. The probability is that this printing will be done by to-morrow morning. The Chair hears no objection to the introduction of the resolution. The question is on its adoption.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. THOMAS. The Legislature of the State of Illinois having adjourned, the president of the senate and two distinguished members of the house—the chairmen of the committee on appropriations and the committee on the judiciary—are now in this city. I ask unanimous consent that they be admitted to the floor of the House during to-day.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I desire to make the same request on behalf of members of the General Assembly of the State of Delaware, who, I have just been informed, will visit the Capitol to-day.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, these requests will be granted.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, we have been informed, and the country has been informed, by the press and by the action of a democratic caucus that the provision now under consideration is one of a series of provisions which it is proposed to incorporate in our laws with a view to destroy the safeguards that hedge the exercise of the elective franchise. Having captured both Houses of Congress it is proposed to complete your conquest and to force Mr. Tilden into the White House in 1880 by tacking him on to an appropriation bill. To accomplish this object the Army, like the Indian, is to be placed on a reservation, and if any officer from the President down shall lead it forth on election day to quell violence, to suppress tumult and disorder, to protect the citizen in the exercise of his sacred right to participate in the administration of the Government by casting a ballot, you propose to send that officer to the penitentiary and burden him with an enormous fine. For years you have dominated one section by force; you now propose to conquer another by chicanery and fraud. Aggrieved at the result of the last presidential election, you propose to carry the next by any and all agencies. Having stricken down the unresisting negro in the South, you propose to cheat and rob the more courageous white man in the North. You have declared that you will vote no supplies until your grievances are redressed.

Is preserving peace at the polls a democratic grievance? Is security to the voter a wrong against the democratic party? Are riot and turbulence and bloodshed democratic allies in electoral contests? When Englishmen declared that Parliament would vote no supplies to the Crown until their grievances were heard and redressed they alluded to the claim of the sovereign to make laws, to levy and collect taxes, to quarter the soldiery on private citizens without the consent of Parliament; they alluded to the pretense of the King that the royal prerogative was something more sublime and holy than the fundamental laws of the realm. Does the Executive of this Republic claim that he can make laws, that he can levy and collect taxes, that he can quarter soldiers in the houses of our citizens, without the consent of Congress? There is nothing in common between the struggle waged by Englishmen in 1640 and in 1688 and the struggle of the democratic party to-day. One was a revolution in the interest of liberty and law; the other is a revolution in the interest of fraud and usurpation. What is the attitude you assume before the country? You solemnly declare that unless the amendment incorporated in this bill becomes a law you will disband the Army by withholding supplies; you will expose our western frontier to the invasion of the Mexican, and to the horrors and brutalities of Indian raids and Indian massacres.

Thus you will strip the President of all power to protect the rights of person and property when assailed by mobs and rioters too strong and too formidable to be dealt with by State authorities; and having divorced him from the Army by starving it into dissolution, you propose to follow up your work by another measure equally revolutionary and equally atrocious in intent and purpose. You propose to declare that unless the President will consent to a repeal of the election laws and to the striking down of all safeguards that protect the voter in the exercise of his elective rights, you will not vote him the salary which the Constitution prescribes he shall have.

You propose to declare to the Federal judges that their courts shall be closed unless the republicans will consent to free frauds at elections. You propose to declare to the pension officers that they shall not settle and adjust the claims of the soldier's widow and orphan unless we on this side of the House shall agree that Tilden shall be at liberty to aid another Tweed in 1880 in perpetrating a series of frauds similar to those practiced in 1868. You propose to declare to the miners and bullion producers of the West that unless the President and the republican party shall agree that repeaters and ballot-box stuffers shall be uninterrupted in plying their infamous arts the mints shall be stopped and coinage shall cease.

You propose to declare to the Land department of this Government that unless all the gateways that lead to the Presidency are not only thrown open, but removed and all restrictions taken away, so that you may have a free course to run in and be glorified, no more titles shall issue, no more conflicting claims shall be adjusted.

These are the resultants of your revolutionary purpose, and we are justified in ascribing them to you, because you are using appropriation bills as the agencies through which your purpose is to be realized. Gentlemen, this scheme will fail as it ought to fail. You cannot reduce the Administration into a surrender by starvation any more than you forced another one into a surrender by war. We stand with Douglas, the great leader of democracy, and declare that the course you are pursuing is revolutionary in its character; that to accomplish your ends you have to override all the rules, all the usages, all the safeguards which time and experience have thrown around your legislative proceedings, in order to insert this provision in this bill. We stand with James A. Bayard and declare that this is coercive legislation, and that it strikes at the fundamental basis on which deliberative assemblies in a free government must necessarily be conducted. We resist it because we believe it to be in the line of the prophecy made by Jefferson, that the danger to our institutions would be found not in the usurpations of the Executive, but in the tyranny of the legislative department of our Government.

Mr. Chairman, whatever disputes have taken place either in the field of political science or in that of practical statesmanship as to the proper limits of the functions and agency of governments, it is now agreed on all hands that the protection of the citizen against force and fraud is one of the necessary functions of all governments, and it is immaterial whether that force and fraud are practiced at the polls or elsewhere.

The sovereignty of this nation is lodged in the people, and that sovereignty can alone be exercised by the ballot. It is the authoritative expression of the will of the voter on all questions of public moment. By it the people decide what laws shall stand and what laws shall fall; what policy shall be inaugurated and maintained, and what policy abandoned; what candidate for popular favor shall wield power and what official shall retire. In short, it embraces within its influence all that is good and all that is bad in the enactment of laws and in their execution; all that is wise and all that is unwise in the policy that fashions the destiny of the nation. In all elections embracing a choice for a representative in Congress; in all elections embracing a choice for an elector in the electoral college, the citizens of every State are interested in the vote cast by the citizens of every other State, because the Representative enacts laws that operate on all the citizens of all the States, just as an elector votes for a President who executes laws that control the nation and govern the fortunes of every citizen within the limits of the Republic.

The law which it is sought to repeal has stood upon the statute-book for fourteen years. Under its provisions not a State has been shorn of any of its rights. Every district in this land has been represented on this floor, and every State has been represented in the other branch of the Legislature. During its existence eighteen confederate generals have marched up to the Capitol and taken their seats in the Senate, the most august legislative body in the world. During its existence the venerable gentleman from Georgia and the distinguished gentleman from Texas, and a host of others who but lately attempted the overthrow of the Constitution, have quietly engaged themselves in this House in enacting laws for the government of the entire country. During its existence the democratic party has acquired control of great States and a majority in both branches of Congress. It was brought into existence by the votes of Hendricks of Indiana, Powell of Kentucky, McDougall of California, Buckalew of Pennsylvania, Saulsbury of Delaware, PENDLETON of Ohio, WOOD of New York, and the distinguished Speaker of this House—and now we are threatened with revolution, with a stoppage of supplies, with a disbandment of the Army if we refuse to repeal it in an appropriation bill. Why not present this question as a distinct and independent measure? Why present it now accompanied with a threat of supplies withheld. You can carry it through both Houses as an independent proposition. You have a majority in both branches of Congress. No man can stay your will. We are powerless here to effectually resist you. No, gentlemen, you mean to coerce the President; you mean to threaten him with the destruction of the Army unless he does your bidding, unless he executes your will, unless he sanctions your revolutionary purposes. This is the sum and substance of it all, and there is no disguise that can cover it against the scrutinizing inquisition of the people.

It has been said, Mr. Chairman, that the Army is under the control of Congress. I concede it. So is every department of this Government so far as the same can be affected by appropriations to carry it on. But because it is under our control are we justified in saying that if the President shall use it to overcome lawlessness, to subdue disorder, to secure to the citizen the free exercise of his elective rights, we will disorganize and overthrow it by withholding supplies? Standing armies have been regarded as standing and continuing menaces to the liberty of the people; but, as Mr. Justice Story has remarked, it is equally true that the want of them may also prove dangerous to the State. The true course is to check the undue exercise of the power, not to withhold it. Your present policy contemplates the destruction of the Army unless this amendment constitutes part of the law. No man asks, no man desires that the Army be used to influence the will of the voter—it is only that it be used to protect him in the exercise and expression of that will. The difference between the use of the Army to direct the citizen how he shall vote and the use of it to protect him in the exercise of his voting privilege is as broad and as well defined as is the distinction between the use of the Army by the first Napoleon when a lieutenant to suppress the violence and tumult and anarchy of the sans culottes in Paris and its use by Napoleon the Third when President of the French Republic to make himself Emperor. One was legitimate, the other was revolutionary and despotic.

We affirm that a government that will not protect its citizen in casting his vote, and especially in a country operated by universal suffrage and dominated by majorities, is unworthy of the allegiance of honorable men. We affirm that it is the absolute duty of the nation to protect the citizen, by the use of the Army or otherwise, in all those rights which immediately concern the operations of the Government; and we affirm that the election of a Representative in Congress or the choice of an elector in the electoral college concerns the General Government, for by the election of the one the law-making power is executed, and by the choice of the other the executive office is filled and the laws made effective. It is no answer to say that the use of the Army may be abused; there is no power or agency operated or wielded by man that is not open to the same objection. "The only security," said a great statesman, "against political slavery is the check maintained over governors by the diffusion of intelligence, activity, and public spirit among the governed." To these agencies do we and must we trust all, either in the executive, legislative, or judicial departments of the Government. This House has the power to determine the election and qualification of its members—a power notoriously and shamelessly abused; a power wickedly prostituted to partisan ends, and yet it is a power indispensable to its rightful organization.

The very power of a court to decide carries with it the possibility of deciding wrongly. The Constitution makes the President the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. He may send our ships to China or anchor them in New York Harbor. He may send our Army to the Texas frontier or quarter it in this city; and in the exercise of his rightful power abuses may come, but the good of society, the stability of our institutions, the security of the citizen require that he shall have the power. From the beginning of the Government down until February 25, 1865, no legal restraint was imposed upon the President as to the places at which he should locate the Army; then for the first time it was declared to be unlawful for any military or naval officer of the United States or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States to order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State unless it shall be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls.

We are now, sir, to take a new departure. We are now to declare that tumult and disorder, bloodshed and murder, shall run rampant at an election and the Government shall be an indifferent spectator. The will of the voter may be overborne; violence may tamper with his ballot and make it speak a lie; a political faction or a band of ruffians may assemble at the various voting places and declare that no Representative shall be chosen except of their political faith; armed men may assemble and prevent others from voting; the eyes of the helpless may turn to this Capitol and to yonder White House; the cries of the oppressed may ascend to God and thunder in the ears of man, and yet this great Government that put down a million of armed men in revolt cannot through its executive officer send a single soldier to their relief, unless that officer is willing to undergo incarceration in a penitentiary and pay an enormous fine. To this pitiful plight do you intend to bring us. In 1861 you told us that the Government had no power to preserve its own existence. In 1879 you tell us that the Government shall have no power to protect its citizens. A nation thus handicapped and fettered is unfit to be ranked among the family of nations.

But, Mr. Chairman, why force this measure on the country now? It was not an issue in the last campaign. No State convention, so far as I am informed, demanded of either party the repeal of the election laws. No State convention demanded that the General Government should refrain from protecting the citizen in the exercise of his elective franchise. The last contest was one embracing almost exclusively financial questions, of bank and anti-bank, of resumption and anti-resumption, and out of that contest you come with a bare majority in this House. In 1875 your majority here was overwhelming. In the Forty-fifth Congress you secured a working majority in this House, not so much through the votes of the people as through the convenient processes that characterized the action of the Committee of Elections. You turned out every republican whose seat was contested, as you no doubt will do during this Congress. Had the people been called upon during the last campaign to pass on the question of the repeal or non-repeal of the election laws, the seats you now hold would be filled by others who believe that honest elections are the only guarantee for the perpetuity of republican institutions.

For forty years, Mr. Chairman, the democratic party held power in this country by extraordinary means and extraordinary agencies. By controlling the ignorant and depraved in the great cities they controlled the great cities, and by controlling the great cities they controlled the great States, and through the great States they controlled the nation. The methods of the past are to be reinaugurated—the barriers against fraud and violence are to be swept away. The pivotal point of the next presidential election is the city of New York, and the struggle now is to acquire control of it so that through it you may control the great State of New York, and through that great State control the nation. The battle we are fighting to-day is but the preliminary struggle to the great Waterloo that is to come on next year.

Mr. Chairman, the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution provides that no person shall be a Senator or Representative, or elector of President or Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States or under any State, who having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress or as an officer of the United States to support the Constitution of the United States shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof; but Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House remove such disability.

When this amendment was adopted it met the approval of the deliberate judgment of the best people of this country. Those who stood by and sustained the Government in its darkest hour sustained it. The conviction was deep-seated and widespread that the men who had saved the country should govern it. Years went by and the humanity of the North blunted the sharp edge of this provision. You told us that our flag should be your flag and we believed you. You told us that our Constitution should be your Constitution and we accepted your statement. Animated by a Christian spirit we relieved you of your disabilities and permitted you to come into this House to make laws for this country. Since your advent you have made your demands one by one, and we have yielded until this which is left on the statute-book is almost the last vestige that remains and which grew out of the amendments to the Constitution which were designed to protect the rights of those who could not protect themselves. At the beginning of this administration you demanded that we should withdraw the Army from the South, and we acceded; you demanded that we should abandon Packard in Louisiana, and the President complied; you demanded that Chamberlain in South Carolina should be guillotined, and the President gave the order, "off with his head." From one step you have hastened to another, until you now declare that unless the President and the republican party surrender absolutely to your will, you will disband the Army of the Union. Gentlemen, we have reached a point beyond which we cannot go. I had hoped that the war with its bitterness was over; "that the melancholy memories of a troubled past" would be allowed to be forgotten. I believe, as surely as I believe in the existence of a God above us, that this nation cannot endure if the hostility between the sections is to be perpetuated. We must either be brothers or enemies; there is no middle ground for our occupation. God has blessed the South with innumerable advantages—a genial climate, a fertile soil, large and expansive rivers whose bosoms can embrace the commerce of a continent and whose waters can be harnessed and made to move innumerable spindles. Prosperity to-day sleeps benumbed in the frozen vault of fear; and the great and mighty North, with its generous and forgiving heart, stands at the door, as Jesus stood at the tomb of Lazarus, ready to resurrect and quicken it with the inspiration of a new life. Gentlemen, will you allow us to do it?

God himself cannot open the closed gateway of the past. What is done is forever and irrevocably done. The seals of eternity are upon it, but He can afford us a vision of the future. What that future shall be must depend upon your efforts and upon ours. We are ready to build up your waste places, to quicken your commerce, to multiply the avenues of your trade, to pour with unstinted hand into your empty treasure-boxes the rich ingots of the North, and all we ask in return is that you respect the laws of our common country, that you zealously guard the humblest citizen in the untrammeled exercise of his right to vote for the man of his choice. We ask you nothing that you cannot honorably accord us. If, on the other hand, you spurn our efforts and repel our aid your future will be troubled and perplexed. You will have wrenched the ivy from the stalwart oak that can give it sustenance and life; you will have broken the arms of the helpless while clasping the sturdy shoulders of the republican St. Christopher. Pause, gentlemen, and consider on which road the footsteps of wisdom are to be found.

Since the election, Mr. Chairman, we have been told by wild and impulsive men that the confederates have crossed the Potomac and seized the Capitol; that the time has almost come when the statues of Lincoln and Grant and Sherman are to be thrown from their pedestals, and those of Davis and Lee and Jackson are to take their places; that the time has almost come when the pictures of heroes who won distinction in the battles waged for the salvation of the Union and the Constitution are to be turned, like that of the unfortunate Doge of Venice, with their faces to the wall; when the constitutional amendments, the very granaries in which we have stored the muniments of title that avouch the freedom of the slave and the sanctity of the nation's credit, are to be wrenched from their places; when all the acquisitions of the war are to be surrendered and abandoned. It may be so. History keeps in her store-house strange surprises for all peoples and all nations. We see the conquered of yesterday the victors of to-day; we have seen the statue of Napoleon hurled from the column Vendome; we have read of the bones of Cromwell being uncoffined and gibbeted in the presence of a people; we have read of a Charles II and a Louis XVIII welcomed back to thrones which had been forfeited by the tyranny and oppression of their ancestors; but we have also read that the people ultimately recovered their senses. For months past we have witnessed the pendulum swinging toward the southern arc of the national circle; but we know that by and by it will swing back, and that when 1880 comes round and the millions in the North who took part in the great struggle marshal into line under the leadership of their great captain the republican party will resume its place as the dominating party of the nation.

I now yield what remains of my hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. HUMPHREY.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, at the close of the last session we were told that free elections required the repeal of the law providing for the appointment of supervisors, and we are now told that the law of 1865, which is a negative affirmative, or rather a negative pregnant law, must be repealed, so that not even a civil officer can use any armed force to keep peace at the polls. Let us inquire, What is the true freedom of the citizen in this respect? Is it not that while every legal voter may exercise the right to vote without let or hinderance, every illegal voter shall be utterly restrained from such an invasion of the rights of the citizen? What danger so great to the life of the Republic as the process of repeaters at the polls, representing men who are dead, misrepresenting the living, using every conceivable means to defraud, so as to swell the vote?

The citizen who favors an honest election can well afford to uphold the most stringent laws that may prevent his power in the use of the ballot being overthrown by the illegal vote cast beside it. Every vote thus cast is a stab at free government. Every man who casts one is an open enemy to his country, and is willing to ride into power over its ruins. Every vote thus cast is a blow aimed at the foundation-stone of the Government, "the knocking off one corner of which may overturn the whole fabric." It will not do to remind us of the survival of States in the old world whose governments were the most corrupt recorded in history, for we cannot forget that under absolute monarchism, if the sway of the ruler be mild and gentle, however licentious and corrupt the ruler and the court may be, the freedom and happiness of the people may be nearly complete, and this though there may be no law save the will of the ruler.

Even under a limited monarchy the court may be corrupt to the last degree, yet the people not be seriously affected by it. The reason is obvious: the masses are entirely separated and never come in contact with the court or with the government. There is an almost inseparable barrier between them. Moreover, by the existence of the nobility, whose jealous care of their own interests serves the purpose of so far aiding the masses that, without the exercise even of the right of suffrage under a limited monarchy, the people in many states enjoy a large share of happiness, prosperity, and freedom. Not so in a republic. In it there must dwell much political virtue, and it must exist by infusion from the people upward and the government downward. It must permeate the masses; there must be a faithful and thorough execution of the laws. We, the people of these United States, enact these laws for our security. They are our mainstay and dependence, and they must be written in the hearts and manners of the people who, in such case, will guard with jealous care the least infraction; for while it is the theory of monarchism that all power flows from the sovereign, it is the theory of a republic that all power springs from the people. Under the guise of freedom of elections there is springing up a lawless license not in any degree akin to freedom, under the shadow of whose wing illegal voting threatens the destruction of free government.

Some point us to the Army and Navy as the constant menace, and at a proper time it would be well to show how unfounded is the charge, to show that the history of all standing armies under constitutional government is one of fidelity and loyalty under the most trying circumstances. Some point to the corruption of this or that administration, that can at best exist only four years if the people will otherwise.

Let not our eyes be thus blinded and our fears lulled into security by the "song of this siren," which in the same strain would compel us to yield the strongest bulwark left us to battle against our final destruction by the insidious foe of popular liberty. Let us not forget that our highest and loftiest aspirations, breathed forth in our declaration of rights, take their rise from that religious faith, Christianity, implanted in the hearts of those who left us the noble legacy.

These traditions cannot be eradicated while we remain free, and we cannot be made slaves while religious liberty survives. On the other hand, political freedom cannot survive religious liberty even for a day. Now, if, as we claim, we all belong to a race that cannot be made slaves so long as life dwells within us, let us cast aside everything that does not savor of good to our country and take a firm stand in favor of honest, loyal, legal suffrage as recognized by the Constitution and laws enacted to attain that result. This grand result I believe the republican party aspires to aid in achieving. Those who number its ranks will compare in honesty, intelligence, thrift, and labor for the right with any party which has ever existed. It has labored for the unification of the whole land, that it may ever be one and inseparable. It has favored every just measure looking to the prosperity of all sections. While it feels that in many parts of the South the suffrage of the colored race is a delusion and a humbug, measures of great importance to the South have had its co-operation, and it has denied nothing on any sectional ground and in no sectional spirit, and if no question of revenue had been involved, would gladly have removed the tax on tobacco, for ultimately the North being small producers and great consumers pay a considerable portion of the tax.

It has recently favored a measure of relief against contagious diseases until some were drawn from it by the amendments attached attempted by those who are willing the Stars and Stripes shall furnish the means but not consummate the end; that the General Government may furnish money for the States to disburse—in other words the doctrine of State rights must step in to prevent the General Government providing against the ravages of a plague the recurrence of which might sweep thousands from the face of the earth. Is it to be wondered at that patience is tried to the utmost if this Government cannot disburse its own money to prevent the recurrence of so direful a calamity for fear of interfering with the prerogative of the States; thus men, families, citizens of these United States must die martyrs to this idea. It reminds us of the man who refused to act as pall-bearer at a funeral, for the reason he had never been introduced to the deceased.

Did any objection appear last year when we the people of these United States were furnishing our money through the War Department in providing rations for our sick, starving, and dying fellow-citizens—the Government exerting itself up to the full line perhaps of its constitutional limits in saving thousands under the direst circumstances from premature graves—and this when an Army unprovided for the pay due it had been left to fight our battles upon the frontier; an Army every one of which was subjected to heavy discounts for the credit given them in supplying means for their families.

Not only did a republican Administration heed the appeals and prayers for supplies and relief in rations and medical aid, but as soon as the appeals of the stricken valley of the Mississippi were heard in the land the hearts of republicans as well as democrats went out after the sorrowing thousands and freely gave of their substance to relieve this sad condition.

With all this before us, the opposition press in many parts of the South treat us as their direct foes and speak in terms of obloquy of the party and its present administration, and we are informed in advance that the amendments to the Constitution are to be trampled under foot. Hear what one of the stalwarts says, in reply to an article in the National Republican:

Yes, thank God, we have captured the Capitol, and in 1880 our man will walk up the White House steps and take his seat in the presidential chair. Then will our glorious triumph be complete; then will we proceed to tear your amendments from the Constitution and trample them in the mire; then will we break the shackle you have forged for the free, sovereign, and independent Commonwealths of the Union; then will we recognize the right of secession, a right that is not dead, but sleeping; then will we decorate the Capitol with the pictures of Davis, and Lee, and Stuart, and all the glorious leaders of a cause that is not lost, but living still. Yes, thank God, we have captured the Capitol, and from that coigne of vantage we propose to rule the Republic in a way that will make your radical laws and your radical leaders forever odious in America.—Okalona (Mississippi) Southern States.

Mauritz Hartmann, the Austrian poet and journalist, says there are to be found in the houses of the Germans from the shores of the Baltic and the North Sea to the Alps more portraits and busts of Lincoln and Grant than all the German princes taken together. Yes, thank the Lord, if the portraits of Davis and Lee are to displace those of Lincoln and Grant the old spirit of the Teuton will rise up and by its infusion with the Anglo-American aid in defeating the monstrous attempt.

At this time and at the present conjuncture these sentiments are suggestive. The Government has resumed specie payment and putting forth every honest and legitimate effort in maintaining our credit and restoring that confidence necessary to a sure and safe return to prosperity, indications of which are appearing, for we are told by the manufacturers of iron that theirs is the last industry that feels the effects of better times; yet they are to-day at low prices finding a ready demand for their manufactures, the country looking for rest and quiet and asking Congress to give it, to restore freely its depressed energies, and in answer to its appeal what is the response?

It asks for bread and you give it a stone; it asks for a fish and you give it a serpent. Do you think under such circumstances the country will quietly lie still and long submit to a party lash being laid on its languishing industries? No; it will only submit until its voice can be heard. The North is massing and will soon present one solid phalanx, and just so sure as you persist in retaining your present attitude just so sure as the sun rises on this Republic on election day in 1880 will your power be overthrown.

And the sentiments expressed in the article referred to must be met in a temperate yet firm and unyielding spirit, while it recalls to mind the sentiment of the fire-worshipers:

Oh for a tongue to curse the slave,
Whose treason with its deadly blight
Comes o'er the councils of the brave
To blast their power in hour of might,

Rebellion! foul dishonoring word,
Whose wrongful blight so oft has stained
The holiest cause that tongue or sword
Of mortal ever lost or gained.

When the clangor of civil strife had ceased; when the brave general of the confederate forces, by the inevitable decree of war, had yielded to the no less noble and intrepid general of the Union arms, and the parole of honor had been given, fortified and sustained by the illustrious commander of the Army, the people everywhere were bowed in silence, while the spirit of forgiveness hovered over the ark of the Republic, whispering, "Peace, be still"—that spirit of which the dumb person wrote in reply when asked what was his idea of forgiveness: "It is the odor flowers yield when trampled upon."

We had hoped that the causes of former discord and strife were obliterated forever. If, however, we are doomed to disappointment we must remind our friends on the other side of this Chamber that as it has been in the past so will it be in the future; the rights of man, the spirit of progress, cannot be turned back on the dial of time.

But each returning cycle will indicate the grand march of American civilization to be onward and upward No power can impede it—it is "manifest destiny." God grant that its highway may not be, as we are told by an eminent writer, like that of Germany in her grand struggles, "McAdamized with human bones and wet with blood."

Parties are but the embodiment of ideas and principles—the moment they cease to be such that moment they are numbered with the past, and I am willing to leave the record of the republican party, its acts, and its results for the pen of the future historian.

But I will venture the prediction that it will be recorded that its existence formed a great epoch in the life of this nation, and that its achievements will be numbered among the grandest ever recorded. When the work of the commune had done, its march and tread hushed to silence in the streets of Paris, and the blood of its victims had hardly ceased to flow, the spirit of the republic arose upon the ruins of the late monarchy, pointing to America and her institutions as the true anchor to cast for the nation.

A few years since, as the republic of Spain was struggling for existence upon the ruins of an absolute and effete monarchy, her most eminent statesmen and orators with pride pointed to America and the spirit of its laws upon which the new republic must build its hopes for regeneration. And the shelves of our Bureau of Education show why Spain, after lingering upon the confines, fell back into a monarchical relapse, while France, with new strength and vigor, is preparing a solid foundation for her republic.

The unification of the German Empire, and consequent creation of its national parliament, led that great people to look to the legislative institutions of our Government, proud to borrow any regarded improvement.

Alas! it cannot be true that soon all may be changed and the prediction of the aristocracy of England be realized, that monarchy alone is the only stable structure to which poor human nature can cling. No matter how enlightened, no matter if we have the wisdom of the ages before us and the experience of the wisest and the best, to-day I fear we are a spectacle before the world of our obduracy, blindness, and stupidity; afraid of our birthright and freedom gained a century since by the valor of our arms; some of our great cities repeating the weaknesses, folly, and cowardice of the cities of the Old World, ready for commercial advantage and wealth to barter their freedom, to allow the political freedom of the citizen at the ballot-box to be invaded while fraud and violence elect men to office rather than stand for the right and refuse to yield to wrong for temporary gain and success.

The question is not what will redound to the glory of the republican or democratic party, but the question of the hour is what will redound to the glory of our country, its institutions. I care not how much strength any party may gain, or how lasting it may be, if but the result of that rule of action which is sustained by the combined wisdom of those whose genius delineates the future happiness of the land; if based upon the perfect equality of each citizen before the law, of whatever lineage or descent; the suppression of all illegal voting; in short, that shall labor for the establishment of that political virtue which alone becomes a republic as its truest safeguard and the brightest jewel in its coronet.

It seems to me no man who thinks well of his country and desires to bid it God-speed can object to the enactment of laws the most rigid and punitory to provide against illegal and fraudulent voting, for without it there is no purity of Government, no hope for a free people.

But aside from the repeal of these laws a great wrong will be done if such repeal is tacked on to an appropriation bill; the right of free discussion becomes involved; the opportunity to freely examine, discuss, and deliberate upon the measure is practically denied; the rights of the minority are shivered to atoms; the rightful prerogative of the executive department of the Government menaced by the attempted coercive power of the legislative department refusing the executive the rightful prerogative of passing upon the true and real merits of the measure, but by a process of intimidation and coercion compelling that department to not only examine the limit of its own rightful authority, but that of Congress also under the Constitution; and it is well to pause if you wish to take as precedents the democratic administrations of Andrew Jackson and James Buchanan.

Under the English constitution such an act by its Parliament would be deemed an attempt to drive the ministry from power; and I will venture the assertion that since the establishment of a standing Army and the provision for its supply at the close of the seventeenth century no such attempt has ever been carried into act by a British Parliament. Under our forms of government, as there is no such thing as the resignation of the ministry, therefore such an attempt, if persisted in, is revolution; for, practically speaking, in this country the party in power and its administration is by the people made the representative of the Federal head; its act and its policy, although held responsible therefor, is regarded as the act and policy of the Government, and such an attempt is therefore a blow aimed not so much at the administration as the Government itself, for it exists under the forms of law created and provided by the people.

Moreover, by such means, if successful, you concentrate in the hands of the Appropriations Committee the whole legislative power of the country. You make such committee an engine of power so destructive to free government that the power of a standing army is no more to be compared to it than the idle winds to a sweeping tornado, or, to be more pointed, the operations of a snail to a streak of lightning. Your committee not only controls your legislation, but you create a centralization of power the most absolute on earth, the most dangerous to our liberties, and the deadliest foe to our progress in governmental science.

The hope of the world rests upon the perpetuity of American institutions. All over the Old World American ideas "fall like rain upon plaster." Our civilization, in some respects peculiar to this Republic, is grand in that its foothold is that sacred muniment of rights, the Declaration; beautiful in that its philosophy breathes the glad tidings of peace and good-will to men; sublime in that it was born of storms and tempests, stood erect, and moved forward amid the thunderings of absolute power and the concentrated tyranny of the ages. Let us hope its grand march will continue until its gigantic strides shall encircle the continents, and the world be led to acknowledge that our—

Doctrines drop like the rain and distill like the dew.

It is to be hoped that the party now in control of Congress will take warning from the signs of the times and cut loose from the doctrines of the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, for the time has passed when such doctrines can flourish—

In the land of the free
And the home of the brave.

Onward is the watchword, and under it the Federal Union must move forward to its rightful destiny.

And the party who hinders and hampers, who will not heed the finger upon the wall, will in its wild delirium leave unbarred the brazen two-leaved gates of its citadel, and before the brightness of the stars give place to the rising sun be hurled from power, its broken fragments crushed to atoms by the car of progress.

Mr. MULDROW. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] calls attention to the fact that the crisis about to be brought upon the country is grave and serious. The question before the House I admit is one of serious import. There is none, indeed, which more directly and immediately concerns the liberties of the people. The right of the American citizen to cast his vote unawed, unintimidated, freely, according to his own will, without interference by the military department of the Government, is certainly a prerogative as serious to him as that question which was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, and which he in his argument styled revolution. If by revolution he means a change of bad laws or odious measures to good and wholesome ones, then we should begin at once to enter upon this programme. The object of this side of the House is not revolution in the odious sense which he in his speech attempted to convey. It is not revolution intended to thwart the operations of good government for the benefit of the people. There has been and will be no effort on this side of the Chamber to destroy the life of the Government. There has not been and will not be any effort to prevent the operation of its machinery upon a plan which will be conducive to the interests, the happiness, and the liberties of the American people. According to the idea of the republican party, it seems that everything the democrats have attempted to do of late has been with the object and the intention of revolution.

I have seen a very proper though caustic criticism in one of the city papers during the past few days on that subject. It is from the Capital of Sunday last:

The democracy, arriving at a majority, elects its own officers, and the republicans call it revolution. The democracy, attaining power, proposes as its first act to abolish the plebiscites of empire and guarantee the free elections of a republic, and the radicals call it revolution. The democracy, sensible of its responsibility, matures its measures in caucus according to the immemorial custom of parties, and radicalism calls it revolution.

Very well. It is revolution. But it is the sort of revolution that frees peoples and enfranchises states. It is the sort of revolution that, since the dawn of civilization, has bowed the heads of despots and broken the chains of tyranny.

If that is what is meant here by revolution, the revolution which the democratic party proposes now to inaugurate to break the chain of tyranny for the people of this country, then I presume it is a revolution that they will not only sanction but applaud.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] recognizes the importance of and makes no argument against the impolicy of the proposed legislation, but confines himself to holding up the specter of revolution. How it can be called revolution for the legislature of this country to insist upon the repeal of obnoxious laws before furnishing the means to execute them is past my comprehension. I do not see how it can be called revolution for the lower House of Congress and the Senate to pass a bill repealing certain objectionable features of certain laws now upon the statute-books. They have abundant precedents for doing it in the manner in which they now propose. They have the example of former Congresses, and especially former republican Congresses.

When we advert to the action of that party in the past, beginning in 1867, which is as far as I have traced it back, and perhaps it goes further if I had the time to make the investigation; but beginning there we find that upon an appropriation bill, the Army appropriation bill, passed March, 1867, they appended a provision which struck absolutely at the constitutional prerogative of the Chief Magistrate of the country. We find they there sought to take from the President that high prerogative which he has under the Constitution of being the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. We find that they did not stop there, but in that bill they deliberately attempted to overturn the Constitution of this country, and in defiance of that instrument to declare that so far as ten States of this Union are concerned, reaching from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, they should be deprived of the right to maintain a militia for their own defense no matter what the importance of it might be.

Sir, we find that in that Congress in the House of Representatives that bill was passed by an overwhelming republican majority, that every republican, so far as I know, in Congress then, and so far as the record shows, voted for these odious measures, and they were passed by a strictly republican vote on that appropriation bill.

And again, when that bill went to the Senate of the United States, under the leadership of the distinguished Senator who now sits there from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] it was rushed through that body. Other republican Senators, among whose names are to be found Morton, Sumner, and others of national character, supported it with zeal, and it was passed by a partisan vote of the then dominant party in the Senate.

Sir, that bill was sent to the President of the United States in that shape, when he in his message declared that it must be signed by him under protest to prevent the failure of appropriations for the Government. I ask the Clerk to read his message as it is very brief.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

The act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes," contains provisions to which I must call attention. Those provisions are contained in the second section which in certain cases virtually deprives the President of his constitutional functions as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and in the sixth section which denies to ten States of this Union their constitutional right to protect themselves in any emergency by means of their own militia. Those provisions are out of place in an appropriation act. I am compelled to defeat these necessary appropriations if I withhold my signature to the act. Pressed by these considerations I feel constrained to return the bill with my signature, but to accompany it with my protest against the sections which I have indicated.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

MARCH 2, 1867.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him whether he indorsed that protest?

Mr. MULDROW. I indorse it so far as those measures are concerned because they were absolutely unconstitutional, and so far as any question which comes before this Congress which is unconstitutional I shall, so far as it lies in my power, attempt to prevent its passage.

Now, sir, the republicans of that day, the republicans of that time, could not have indorsed that as proper legislation, but it was inaugurated simply for partisan purposes.

There are other precedents. We come down to 1872. We find then upon the sundry civil appropriation bill of that year one of these very odious laws which we now hope to be able to repeal. It was incorporated into that bill and it passed a republican Senate and a republican House. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] himself was on the conference committee and brought back the report from that committee, including that affirmative legislation, and recommended its passage by the House. In the Senate they struggled all night long under the leadership of Senators CONKLING, EDMUNDS, Howe, and Morton; they struggled all night long to force that odious and objectionable feature in that bill upon the democrats of the Senate. Then I say so far as the republican party is concerned it is estopped from asserting that this is an improper method of legislation.

If it was not revolution to authorize the appointment of Federal overseers, spies, and informers upon the people at the ballot-box in 1872, how does it become revolution to put proper, legitimate, and constitutional legislation on an apppropriation bill in 1879?

And the last Army appropriation bill passed by the American Congress, consented to by both Houses, one democratic and the other republican, and approved by a republican President, the self-same man who is now expected by the other side to interpose the veto, contains important legislation, and declares that—

From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress.

Again, we have the example of the Forty-fourth Congress, which refused to grant supplies to the Army except coupled with the provision that that Army was not to be used in maintaining certain fraudulent State governments in the States of Louisiana and South Carolina. The democratic party went to the people upon both of these propositions, and they indorsed the action of Congress. The truth is that Congress has been more timid in reference to questions of legislation than the people. Congress has not shown the determination in righting the wrongs which have been inflicted upon this people since the close of the war by republican laws that has been expected of it. I believe the voters of the country expect this Congress to move prudently but constantly and firmly forward until the last vestige of these obnoxious laws have been stricken from the statute-books. The revolution they expect is one of converting tyranny into freedom, of having it understood that the military arm of the Government shall be held in subordination to that of the civil; that we shall return to that condition of things which recognizes the fact that all republican governments must rest upon the consent of the governed, and this is the revolution to which the democracy of this country is pledged, and this is the revolution that the people of this country will uphold.

The gentleman from Ohio himself voted against this bill when it originally passed, as he stated himself on the floor of the House on Saturday. I presume, then, that he has no objection per se to the repeal of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I will vote with pleasure for the repeal of the bill, and in doing so I will act consistently with my former course.

Mr. MULDROW. If the gentleman objects to the method only, he should not complain of that, for he sanctioned it himself in 1872. He says he proposes to meet us on the skirmish line. I have yet to learn that a good general in command of an army is apt to send his biggest gun to the skirmish line. My idea has been that the practice is to reserve the strongest forces for the final charge, and I was astonished, therefore, when the gentleman intimated that he only stood on the skirmish line.

Mr. HASKELL. If the gentleman from Mississippi will permit me, I will say we did send our best gun to the skirmish line, and I have known generals in action to do that when they were certain, as we are, of capturing the enemy at the first onset.

Mr. MULDROW. I am unable to appreciate the gentleman's observation, for the main army of the enemy is not found on the skirmish line.

Not only the gentleman from Ohio but the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] and others now on the other side voted to put upon the sundry civil appropriation bill in 1872 that provision to place supervisors of the Federal Government at the elections, therefore they cannot refuse to give this amendment their support, for the reason that it is an obnoxious method of procuring legislation.

Mr. Chairman, the country is expecting relief in this matter.

Mr. CONGER. What part of the country expects it?

Mr. MULDROW. I say the whole country, North and South, expects it. The North is more affected to-day by the supervisors law than the South. The North is more outraged by the operations and practical usage made of the law authorizing supervisors and marshals. You have fifty-five cities where the law operates, while the South has but fourteen. I have no doubt that the law has been more abused in Philadelphia and New York than in any portion of the South. At the recent election in Philadelphia they appointed as marshals, every one of whom was a republican, without a single democrat among them, persons who were notoriously corrupt, who had been accused of and some of them sentenced for the gravest crimes.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask the gentleman if he may not have mistaken a member of the Ohio Legislature for a marshal in Philadelphia in his miscellaneous reading?

Mr. MULDROW. No, sir.

I was surprised to find that by the statement of the facts, or the statement of pretended facts by the gentleman from Ohio, he attempted to throw the shame and the responsibility of that legislation upon the democratic party. He was a party to that legislation. He was present when it was enacted. He knew the facts and the circumstances. He was apprised of the manner in which it was introduced. He knew its history from beginning to end; and I was astounded to find that a gentleman of his high character and standing should have left untold that very important fact in connection with it, that this objectionable feature of which we now complain, and which we seek now to repeal, was the work, not of the democratic, but the republican earty. So important a factor was the gentleman in the making of that legislation, that he could not have been ignorant of the fact that the democratic measure did not contemplate the use of troops at the polls in any event. Why was it that the unfair statement of the gentleman from Ohio was made upon this floor? And why was it that he attempted to induce the country to believe—for I judge from the temper of his speech that it was made more for the country than for members upon the floor—why was it that he attempted to induce the country to believe that this was democratic legislation, and that it was supported by democrats then in Congress? Was it for the purpose of making political capital? Was it for the like purpose of a party advantage when he talks about revolution, and holds up this specter to frighten members upon this side of the Chamber? And was it for a party advantage his effort to make the people of the country believe that those on this side of the House desire, to use his language, to seek to cause the Government to die, not by the bullet, but by starvation? Why did he not have the fairness and the justice to state all the facts in connection with that obnoxious law? And in this connection I would ask, is his object to so shape public opinion by inducing the country to believe that the democrats are now seeking to undo what they themselves did voluntarily with the view of upholding in the estimation of the people of the country the prophesied executive veto?

I imagine that when this act was passed, just after the cessation of actual war, just after the troops upon both sides had left the field, just after the sword had been sheathed, and the veterans of war upon both sides had been converted into citizens of peace; when it was supposed that the country was tired of the display of military power, and that each side, both North and South, were willing and anxious to pursue the paths of peace, that it was little expected that an act of this character would be so perverted by an unscrupulous administration as to become the means in his hands of overawing the people at the polls or deterring them from the exercise freely of the elective franchise. It was little supposed that it would be made the means and the instrument of crushing out the liberties of the people in any part of the country. But the public mind was then accustomed to the use of the Army. Under a different condition of things, under a condition of things when the people were schooled to thoughts of peace and not to those of war, I imagine no such legislation would have been contemplated, certainly no such would have been attempted, and if it had been there would have been universal indignation upon the part of the liberty-loving people from one end of the country to the other. I do not believe that any democrat who at that time participated in the making of that law, giving the power to use the Army to keep the peace at the polls, thought that that power would be resorted to, under that pretext, to destroy the freedom of the ballot-box, of overturning legitimate State governments, and holding in awe of its power all the civil tribunals in the land. They little supposed that those who would be charged with the execution of it would so torture it from its legitimate purpose and its true meaning as to make it the instrument of crushing the liberties of the people which had been vouchsafed to them by the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are threatened with the exercise of the veto power of the President. We are told that if we insist upon carrying out the democratic idea, that all this vicious legislation in regard to controlling elections in this country in the interest of a party is to be expunged, then the President will stop it by the intervention of his negative. The republican party do great injustice, if not to the man to the high office which he holds, when they threaten this side of the House in advance of the exercise of that prerogative. If their declarations are to be believed, that they know what his action will be, then it is discreditable to an officer of this Government occupying that high place to have foreshadowed even by declaration or intimation what his action will be in reference to bills to be passed by the American Congress.

I must believe, and I must be pardoned for saying, that it is impossible in the decent nature of things that he could have so far forgotten the dignity, the decorum, and the good manners of that high place to have at this early day indicated what his action would be in regard to these measures. No, sir; I cannot believe that the President will exercise the veto power in any such manner. I cannot believe that he will stop the wheels of this Government by the use of the veto power simply for the purpose of preventing legislation that looks to the security of the liberty of the people and their rights to freely and unawed cast their ballots for the officers of their choice. The history of the past shows us that the veto power has always been exercised with great caution. I have seen it stated, and nowhere denied, that from the earliest period of the history of this Government down to the present time the President has never interposed a veto simply for the purpose of preventing the repeal of a law. We have no right and no reason to believe that the President, that the man who now occupies that place, will act in a manner so variant and dissimilar from his predecessors. We have no right to presume that he will not recognize the precedents of the past. We have no right to suppose that he will not profit by the habit of governments less republican in form than ours.

Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says:

> The British king, with all his sovereign attributes, has rarely interposed this high prerogative, and that more than a century has elapsed since its actual application. If, from the offensive nature of the power, a royal hereditary executive thus indulges serious scruples in its actual exercise, surely a republican President, chosen for four years, may be presumed to be still more unwilling to exert it.
>
> He will do it only on extraordinary occasions, when a just regard for the public safety or public interests, or a constitutional obligation, or a necessity of maintaining the appropriate rights and prerogatives of his office compel him to the step; and then it will be a solemn appeal to the people themselves from their own representatives.

From English history we learn that this negative power of the king has not been exercised since 1692—

A fact—

Says Justice Story—

> which can only be accounted for upon one of two suppositions: either that the influence of the Crown has prevented the passage of objectionable measures, or that the exercise of the prerogative has become so odious that it has not been deemed safe to exercise it except upon the most pressing emergencies.

The same may be said with reference to the exercise of the same power in France. Everywhere and in every country it is a prerogative which has been given to the chief officer, whether he be King or President, to be exercised with the greatest circumspection and caution.

The gentleman from Ohio is mistaken when he says we seek to coerce the President by declaring that unless he approves the bills as passed by Congress we will destroy the Government. He challenges this side of the House to show where this consent of the President has been coerced as a condition-precedent to the passage of an appropriation bill for the support of the Government. If examples are to be the test, I would ask the gentleman from Ohio where is the precedent that the President has ever vetoed an appropriation bill on which the support of the Government depended? When he shows me the one I will show him the other.

I cannot believe, I repeat, that the President will take the position prophesied or assumed by his republican friends; but if he should, then the responsibility is upon him for attempting to coerce Congress into doing something which we believe the American people demand shall not be done.

Mr. Chairman, the right to maintain at all in time of peace a standing army in this country is one which the people have always looked upon with jealousy and suspicion, and the experience of the past fifteen years has tended to augment the distrust which they have for the exercise of this right. They have seen it invade the sovereign States of the Union; they have seen it arrest and drag from their homes the peaceful and orderly citizen without warrant, without trial, in times of profound peace, and without provocation; they have seen the citizen, by the use of the military force, incarcerated without the benefit of a trial by a jury of his peers, and it is no wonder that they are restive under the exercise of the right to keep a standing army in the country to be used at the ballot-box. It is no disposition to make war upon the Government, nor to render it less effectual and powerful with reference to its foes either at home or abroad, but it is the fear that the people have that this power will be abused in the hands of ambitious and unscrupulous men and for partisan and unpatriotic purposes.

It is no new jealousy. As far back as 1800 Mr. Randolph, in speaking of this subject, said:

I suppose the establishment of a standing army in the country not only a useless, an enormous expense, but upon the ground of the Constitution, the spirit of that instrument and the genius of a free people are equally hostile to this dangerous institution which ought to be resorted to (if at all) only in extreme cases of difficulty and danger; yet let it be remembered that usage, that immemorial custom, is paramount in every written obligation; and let us beware of ingrafting this abuse upon the Constitution. A people who mean to continue free must be prepared to meet danger in person, not to rely upon the fallacious protection of mercenary armies.

Could he have foreseen the purposes for which the Army has been used in this country of late years his language would have been more emphatic, that the spirit and genius of a free people are equally hostile to this dangerous institution which ought to be resorted to only in extreme cases of difficulty and danger. This legislation is a badge of the autocratic and despotic power of that period in the history of the country just after the close of the war, and while at the time not intended, I presume, for the purposes for which it has since been used, yet the design of those who now seek to prevent its repeal is seen. Under it they may invade the rights of the States and forcibly, if necessary, carry elections in the interests of a political party. It is an immense stride in the direction of military despotism. Before the war no man in this country supposed it was possible that the Government would ever use its military arm for the purpose of carrying an election in the interest of any political party under the pretext of keeping peace at the polls. And the exercise of this unwarrantable power, unwarrantable according to the spirit of our Constitution, shows how important it is for the people to be ever watchful to preserve their liberties by the withholding of the power to use a standing army for such a purpose under the pretext of a preservation of the public peace.

This law has been used for the destruction of free and untrammeled election in certain parts of this country. The republican party hate to give it up, for through it and by it they may yet hope to dominate again in the Southern States of this Union, and by its instrumentality enable them to elect their President in 1880, and again usher in the days of autocracy and nepotism.

As a rule it is to be admitted that general legislation on appropriation bills should be avoided. But the precedents in this country as well as the old sanction and approve this mode of legislation when by it great good is to be accomplished in the interest of the people. The birth and growth of British liberty show that it is sometimes not only necessary but sanctioned by every consideration of patriotism for the preservation of constitutional liberty. The British Commons has constantly refused to grant supplies when such refusal has been necessary to prevent the use of the army for purposes of tyranny and oppression.

The supreme question with us is whether we shall now yield to the dictation of the republican party, and whether we will permit the liberties of our people to be trampled out of existence by interference with free elections, and whether we will allow these odious measures to remain upon the statute-book as a menace to the voter at the polls. By the showing made by the gentleman from Ohio the Army is now under the control of a partisan President, and we know that it is commanded by a partisan general. The history of the past few years has demonstrated that a President of that political party and the General now in command have not hesitated to use the military at the polls, not for the preservation of peace but to overawe the voter and conduct the election in the interest of their political party.

I have, under this provision of law now sought to be repealed, seen men arrested at the ballot-box without cause and without warrant. I have seen citizens, who performed all of the other duties of life with strict fidelity to duty, refuse to go to the polls to deposit their ballots because armed men had been stationed there, and who upon various pretexts would arrest voters without provocation and without cause. In my judgment, therefore, this Congress would be recreant to its duty if it failed to insist upon the repeal of this objectionable law.

The democratic party is pledged to uphold the rights of the people; it is pledged to maintain the civil liberty of the citizen, and it should take no step backward with reference to having free and fair elections. On the other hand the republican party is seeking power, military power—and it is believed by the people it is to be used against their liberties. But recently a republican Secretary of War, desiring to have no trammels upon the use of the Army, advocates and advises the repeal of the posse comitatus clause of the last Army bill, in order, I suppose, that it may be used to hunt down, arrest, and incarcerate the people of the country. I believe it to be the duty of Congress to regulate and control the Army, and it is the duty of the President to recognize the laws of Congress passed for its control. He is merely the organ to execute the will of the people as expressed by Congress. The Constitution contemplates that Congress shall have the right to check the undue exercise of power by the President. It gives to Congress the right to furnish supplies; and Justice Story in his commentaries upon the Constitution holds that the Army "may be disbanded at the pleasure of the Legislature; and it would be impossible for any President, against the will of the nation, to keep up a standing army, terrorem populi."

There is but one question which has excited more interest in the old country, from whom we derive our laws, than that of the maintenance and use of a standing army, and that the right of the trial by jury. For both of these great principles the people of the British kingdom have contended from the time when Magna Charta was extorted from King John by the barons with sword in hand, and when it was admitted that elections of Members of Parliament ought to be free; and this principle finally culminated in the passage of the statute of George II, which declares:

SEC. 2. And be it enacted, That on every day appointed for the nomination or for the election or for taking the poll for the election of a member or members to serve in the Commons House of Parliament no soldier within two miles of any city, borough, town, or place where such nomination or election shall be declared or poll taken shall be allowed to go out of the barrack or quarters in which he is stationed, unless for the purpose of mounting or relieving guard, or for giving his vote at such election; and that every soldier allowed to go out for any such purpose within the limits aforesaid shall return to his barrack or quarters with all convenient speed as soon as his guard shall have been relieved or vote tendered.

SEC. 3. And be it enacted, That when and so often as any election of any member or members to serve in the Commons House of Parliament shall be appointed to be made, the clerk of the Crown in chancery or other officer making out any new writ for such elections shall, with all convenient speed, after making out the same writ, give notice thereof to the secretary at war, or, in case there shall be no secretary at war, to the person officiating in his stead, who shall, at some convenient time before the day appointed for such election, give notice thereof in writing to the general officer commanding in each district of Great Britain, who shall thereupon give the necessary orders for enforcing the execution of this act in all places under his command.

In this act of Parliament it is substantially declared that on the day for election of members of Parliament no soldier within two miles of any city, borough, town, or place of voting shall be allowed to go out of his barracks except to mount guard or to give his vote. The ballot-box is to be entirely exempt from the presence of soldiers except where they themselves desire to cast their ballots. One day is given up to the free exercise of the elective franchise, and no matter what occurs the soldier is not permitted to interfere with the conduction or the progress of that election. If that is the rule in the Kingdom of Great Britain, where kingly laws and kingly customs determine the rights of the people, how can it be expected that the exercise of the right to use an army at the polls can be tolerated in republican America?

The gentleman from Ohio anticipates that other action will be had by the democrats in this Congress. He claims that they will insist upon the repeal of other objectionable laws which are intended to infringe upon and interfere with the exercise of the rights of the voters of the country, and that they will insist that that which permits United States marshals to arrest citizens at the voting places without warrant and at their own discretion shall be expunged; that that which clothes supervisors with like authority shall be obliterated; and that there shall be a repeal of what is commonly known as the Federal jurors' test oath. I am not authorized to say to what extent the gentleman's supposition is true, but I do say that in my judgment, and speaking for myself only, every vestige of law which interferes with the free exercise of the right of the voter, which authorizes over his conduct Federal espionage, which creates overseers to watch him as they would a slave and to report upon him in order that he may be punished for some fancied violation of law, which requires of the citizen of one section of this country an oath which not one decent man in a hundred can take, and which authorizes upon suspicion the arrest of good citizens without warrant, and upon the will alone of partisan officials, should be wiped as with a sponge from the statute-books of this country.

I believe it to be the duty of the democratic party to stand as one man and insist that the liberty of the citizen shall be upheld, and that no more effectual means can be devised for the accomplishment of that end than the repeal of these objectionable laws. If the gentleman from Ohio is correct in his assumption that the President will veto these repeals, then, I repeat, let the responsibility be upon him and the republican party. If there is revolution in that, they are the revolutionists; they are the party and he is the officer whose veto will thwart the will of the people as expressed by their representatives in Congress, and he will for partisan purposes exercise a constitutional prerogative in the interest of tyranny and in violation of every principle of liberty and freedom.

In conclusion, permit me to say that I hope there will be no such issue made by the President with Congress as is prophesied by his party friends. Permit me to say that I hope that he will not attempt to coerce Congress into the action which his friends intimate. I hope he will not attempt to exercise the prerogative of the veto in a manner which in kingly countries has never been recognized and never been acted upon. I hope that in republican America the spectacle will not be presented of the highest officer in the land putting himself in that way between the operations of the Government and the interest of the people; that he will hesitate long before he will give his consent, before he will make up his mind to take any such responsibility.

I hope he will endeavor to come up to that standard of a President which is recognized by that great judge, who once sat in the judicial tribunals of this country, Judge Story, who says he ought not to be a narrow partisan, but that he should be "a man of elevated talents, of ripe virtue, of incorruptible integrity, and of tried patriotism—one who shall remember that he represents not a party, but the whole Republic."

I now yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, [Mr. CHALMERS.]

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, the eloquent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] commenced his grand campaign oration on last Saturday by giving us a repetition of his reference to the efforts of Bismarck, the high priest of centralism in Europe, to control the subject of religion. And he announced that in his opinion this Government could not control that subject. That was a gratifying announcement to us who believe that both civil and religious liberty were established by the American Revolution. We are thankful for small favors. When we recollect that Catholic and Episcopal ministers were dragged from their altars for refusing to pray for the President of the United States; when we recollect the order of the War Department of November 30, 1863, directing the commanding generals to seize and turn over to Bishop Ames every house of public worship belonging to the Methodist Church in the South unless it was occupied by a loyal minister appointed by a loyal bishop; and when we recollect, too, that at Portsmouth and in Norfolk, Virginia, churches were placed under the orders of provost-marshals, with power to remove ministers, to assess congregations, and with instructions to report to that eminently fit and pious individual, General B. F. Butler, of Massachusetts, our hearts are filled with gratitude that there was one effort of republican despotism which the gentleman from Ohio did not approve.

A good Methodist sister, discussing the rules of the discipline, once said that she did not see any very great harm in a breast-pin or in ear-rings, in jewelry, or in a few fine clothes; but that she thought a stand must be made somewhere; "and for my part, sister Jones, I stands on feathers." [Laughter.]

Now, in the rapid advance of the republican party toward despotism, in its efforts to swallow up everything from the ballot-box to the church, we are glad to see that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio stands on religion. He next entered into a philosophical and able argument (for every argument which that gentleman makes is able, is full of research and thought) upon the constitutional powers of this Government. He said that the foreigner might regard it as the weakest government in the world; but to us, who know it as it is, it is the mightiest government on earth. That Government is founded upon a written constitution adopted by giant intellects after tireless and exhaustive debate. An intelligent foreigner, if he can read that Constitution and study those debates, might come to the conclusion that the Government had been founded on the great fundamental idea of the Declaration of Independence, that all human governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. He might, therefore, conclude that a government thus framed might cease to exist when force and coercion were substituted for the free will of the people. He might believe that a government thus constituted would be free, pure, and just; but that it would not be what is technically called a strong government. I agree with the gentleman on that point.

But I agree with him still more fully upon the other, that to us who know it as it is, as it has been consolidated by republican usurpation, as it has been administered by republican despots, it is the strongest and the mightiest government on earth. A British ministry would have been driven from power, a British king might have been decapitated for far less usurpations than have been made by the republican party during the last eighteen years.

I am glad, therefore, that we have the time; I am glad that the momentous interests involved furnish the occasion to enter now fully into a discussion of the constitutional rights of this Government.

It is a fitting celebration of the return of the grand old democratic party into power. It is a fitting time to examine into the first principles laid down by the founders of this Government that we may return to the practice of our democratic ancestors.

This Government for the last eighteen years has been reeling like a drunken man. It has rocked like a ship at sea without chart, compass, or rudder. The unbridled will of a mere despotic majority has bid defiance to law and Constitution. Bribery and corruption have held high carnival in the Halls of Congress, and reckless and criminal extravagance have permeated every branch of the Government. It is time that the old ship was righted up; that the officers and crew, drunk with power, debauched by the continuance of licentious indulgences, should be driven out and replaced by purer and better men.

The gentleman from Ohio regaled us with two references to current history. In the first, his most remarkable omission of the most material fact in the case leaves him subject to the charge of either suppression or ignorance of the truth. I would not for one moment charge that honorable and distinguished gentleman with suppression of the truth. I know how difficult it is, I might say how impossible it is, for us to remember everything that we do or say upon this floor. The remarks made by gentlemen on this side, the remarks made by the distinguished gentleman himself, in the last Congress show that both he and they had forgotten the history of this law. In the last Congress he tacitly admitted that his own party had enacted these laws which we now seek to repeal. He said that it was done under far different circumstances than the present; that these laws had fulfilled their purposes; and he expressed a willingness to see them "mustered out of service as we mustered out the victorious armies when the war was done."

The gentleman never grants to the democracy any of the glory attached to the mustering in or the mustering out of the armies of the war. It is not therefore to be supposed that he intended when he made these remarks to include any other than his own party in the glory that might be attached to the mustering in of these laws to which he has given a place in history alongside of the victorious armies of the war. But when he thought he could make a sensational point by charging that the democratic party was threatening to destroy the Government if they could not repeal the very laws which they themselves had enacted, he paraded the fact before this House that on the final passage of this law every democrat in the House and in the Senate voted for it. I exposed this unfair and, I might almost say, fraudulent presentation of the case in a short speech I made last Saturday. I showed then that the democracy in 1864 was demanding a suppression of military depotism at the polls; that they asked for it in the very same language that we have now placed upon this appropriation bill; that a republican majority in the Senate, against the protest of Mr. Powell, the author of the bill, against the vote of every democratic Senator then upon the floor, forced by way of amendment these very words upon the bill which we now seek to strike out. But even as thus amended it was resisted. It was resisted from beginning to end by the radical republicans of the Senate. Mr. Howard, of Michigan, who led the opposition to the bill, who made the report against it as introduced by Mr. Powell, who made the most able speech against it, placed his opposition every time upon the ground that the presence of the military at elections was a war measure demanded for the time being in the border States, but at the same time he admitted that in times of peace it was utterly unjustifiable. When the proposition was made to reconsider the vote after it had been passed in the Senate that gentleman used this language:

> In a time of peace I agree, there being no necessity for the use of this tutelary authority which I have referred to, it would be incompetent for Congress to pass any laws relating to the qualifications of electors in a State, or in any way regulating their election. We all know that a state of war and a state of peace are two very different things.

The bill passed. It came to this House. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] placed himself in line alongside of Howard, CHANDLER, and that class of republican Senators who voted against the bill because, as they claimed, it interfered with the military right to regulate the elections in the States. Well, therefore, might the gentleman, in speaking of these laws, say that they should be "mustered out of service."

One word now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.] He said on last Saturday that I had not given a full history of this law; that Reverdy Johnson, the great lawyer of Maryland, had indorsed it in the very words in which it now stands upon the statute-book, and that Mr. Johnson as Senator opposed the reconsideration when it was asked for in the Senate.

Mr. Chairman, I bow in humble reverence before the name and the memory of Reverdy Johnson. I can never do too much honor to the Spartan firmness, to the more than Roman dignity with which he and Powell and Saulsbury and the little band of democrats that stood around them then, battled for the Constitution, when an arrogant and intolerant majority banished men from the country for freedom of speech, when they were dragging members from the halls of Congress, and when they were converting a constitutional Union into a military despotism. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has made the charge. Let Reverdy Johnson answer for himself, and as his words come back to us from the silent echoes of the tomb, let his memory be forever vindicated. Speaking of these laws he said:

> The amendments made and which now form a part of this bill go further than I think we have a right to go, but in the name of freedom I implore the Senate not to go a step further. * * * Oh save us! save us in the name of freedom; save us in regard to the sacred memory of our ancestors; save us from the rule of military despotism.

Sir, I can now only add to that, may God in his mercy save us from any more political exigencies in which it may seem proper to gentlemen on this floor to misrepresent the dead and blacken the names of such men as Lazarus Powell and Reverdy Johnson by charging that they were ever the advocates of using the United States Army to keep the peace at the polls!

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] indulged in another historical reference to which I propose briefly to reply. After telling us there were two methods of destroying this Government without firing a hostile gun—one by the refusal to elect Representatives and Senators, and the other by the refusal of those Representatives to pass appropriation bills when they were elected—he said that the first method had been honorably attempted by the southern democrats in 1861, and that the other was now being dishonorably attempted by the united democracy in 1879. He said that because the republican party saw fit to elect a President of its own choice the southern democrats threatened to shoot the Union to death. Sir, we made no such threats, and the gentleman is as far from the truth of history when he makes this statement as he was when he charged that the democracy in 1864 advocated the clause in the law which we now seek to repeal. We claimed the right of peaceable secession, and for causes deemed sufficient to us we attempted peaceably to secede. Every son of the South who held a position here or in the Army or in the Navy gave it up. They turned over their commands to the United States Government. They settled their accounts to the uttermost farthing peaceably and honorably. We not only made no threats "to shoot the Union to death," but we said to you as the patriarch Abram said to Lot, let there be no strife between thee and me, you may go to the North and we will go to the South. But it was you who said to us you shall not go. You sent grand armies after us. You hemmed us in by land and by sea. You not only threatened to shoot but you shot us to death. With the battle-cry upon your lips of the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was, you rallied the whole North without regard to party in defense of the old flag, and when the battle was won——

Mr. PRICE. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman talks about firing and shooting, where was the first gun fired? [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. CHALMERS. The first gun was fired near Harper's Ferry, when southern blood was shed on southern soil. [Great applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there shall be any further manifestations of approval or dissent in the galleries the Chair will be compelled to order them to be cleared.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman knows very well that at Harper's Ferry John Brown had only sixteen men, who did not destroy the Union, but that the first gun was fired at Sumter.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, my time is limited and I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me any further. When the battle was won you tore off the veil that covered your hideous deformity; you dissolved the Union that you had saved; you changed the Constitution of our fathers for which you had pretended to fight; you changed State sovereignties into military provinces; you converted the constitutional Union by usurpation into almost a military despotism presided over by a successful military chieftain; you organized returning boards that stole State governments and ended in stealing the Presidency itself. And when you had riveted the chains as you believed upon Southern States you forged chains for the States of the North. Without any request from Legislatures or governors you sent troops into New York, Philadelphia, and other cities under this newborn power to keep the peace at the polls. In the city of New York alone three thousand armed men, infantry and artillery, were assembled upon election day, equipped with one hundred and fifty rounds of ammunition to the man; but not satisfied with this, two vessels of war were anchored at the wharf with their guns trained upon the city. Governors and people, without regard to party, protested against this violent usurpation of power. The spirit of liberty and the inborn hatred of despotism which exists in every American freeman was aroused, and a tidal wave of popular indignation swept the majority of the republican party in disgrace from the Representatives Hall. The Forty-fourth Congress, fresh from the people, demanded that these military usurpations should cease. They demanded especially that the Army should no longer be used as a posse comitatus in civil affairs. A republican Senate, holding over in defiance of the people's will, refused to yield to this just demand for a redress of grievances. They declared they would rather see the Army starve than they should give up one jot or tittle of their ill-gotten power. That forced an extra session of the Forty-fifth Congress, and when the people's representatives met they made the same demand again, and again it was defeated by a republican Senate. Each time an appeal was taken to the people, whom the gentleman from Ohio has described most eloquently as the great sovereign of us all; and each time the democratic House was sustained by that sovereign.

Now the Forty-sixth Congress has met in extra session forced upon the country by the stubborn resistance of the republican Senate to the will of the people so often expressed; and the majority of this House has now presented the same demand for the withdrawal of the troops from the polls that was presented by the democracy in the Forty-fifth Congress. The gentleman from Ohio, and many others on his side of the House, in the last session, admitted that it was repugnant to the every idea of Anglo-Saxon liberty that troops should be used at the polls. He indicated then a willingness that these laws, as he expressed it, might be "mustered out of service." Now he has changed his front. His excuse for this change is twofold. First he says that the democracy of the Forty-fifth Congress showed no disposition to compromise. Upon this point he is flatly met by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] chairman of the House conference committee, who states that he was not only willing but offered to compromise, but that no compromise could be made unless he yielded everything which the republican Senate seriously contended for.

But the second and the great excuse of the gentleman was that the democratic party is inaugurating a revolutionary method of legislation by attempting to coerce a co-ordinate branch of the Government by placing legislation upon an appropriation bill, and this he denounces as revolutionary. If the mere fact that legislation is found upon an appropriation bill be revolutionary, then the history of republican legislation shows revolution after revolution that has been accomplished by the republicans during its period of power, and one of these bloodless revolutions has been accomplished by the gentleman from Ohio himself, who, when he was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, tacked on an appropriation bill one of these objectionable election laws. If it be revolutionary to put upon an appropriation bill a measure which perchance the President may not approve, then the freedom of this House might as well be surrendered, we might as well permit the President to dictate to us what kind of legislation is pleasing to his most excellent highness.

If, again, it is revolution to put upon an appropriation bill a measure which we have reason to believe or know will not meet the approval of the President, then a republican Congress has set that example in its most offensive form. If it be coercion to do what we now propose, then a republican House in 1856 undertook to coerce both a democratic Senate and a democratic President; and in 1867 they absolutely did coerce Andrew Johnson into a surrender of a portion of his constitutional prerogatives. And all this was done upon an Army appropriation bill. Yet the gentleman from Ohio, in a style that the elder Booth might have envied, has attempted to startle the country with the declaration that the democratic party is entering upon a new and revolutionary method of legislation. The coercion of Andrew Johnson was one of the most iniquitous acts of usurpation ever perpetrated by the republican party in the long list of its violations of constitutional rights.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a single question.

Mr. CHALMERS. I have not much time.

Mr. HAWLEY. Is the gentleman not aware that the republicans had more than a two-third majority in that Congress; and if so, how was there any coercion?

Mr. CHALMERS. I am glad the gentleman has called my attention to that fact. There was a two-third majority, but there were in that Congress high-minded republican gentlemen who, upon a separate vote, voted against that clause which took from the President this constitutional power. And I will say here that while they subsequently voted for the bill on its final passage, I will not imitate the gentleman from Ohio by charging those men with sanctioning every clause of the law as it was enacted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KENNA. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CHALMERS. I only desire a few minutes.

There was no objection, and the time was extended.

Mr. CHALMERS. I thank my friend and the House for this courtesy. Andrew Johnson was a President elected by themselves, and yet, because he refused at their dictation to continue the violations of the Constitution which during a state of war were deemed necessary to save the Union, they pursued him with the remorseless fury of hyenas. In the act passed in March, 1867, they not only took from him his constitutional power to command the Army, but, as has been well said by my colleague from Mississippi, [Mr. MULDROW,] they at the same time undertook to deprive ten sovereign States of their constitutional power to protect themselves; they disbanded their militia and forbade its reorganization without the consent of Congress. Every man who voted for that iniquitous measure was a republican. But, as I have just said to gentlemen on the other side, there were some republicans so shocked at this outrageous violation of constitutional right that they refused to vote with the majority. Andrew Johnson on that trying occasion set an example to his republican friends which they would do well to remember now Rather than see the wheels of this Government stopped he signed that bill; but he signed it under protest, and thus made his appeal to the country.

If it is deemed necessary to make another appeal to the people on the question now at issue, the republican President can make his choice. He can either follow the example of Andrew Johnson, or he can, as the gentleman from Ohio said, destroy this Government without firing a single hostile gun. It is for him, not for us, to say which course he will choose.

Now, Mr. Chairman, legislation upon appropriation bills has been denounced by the democratic party in the past, and even now we admit that it should never be resorted to except in the most extreme cases like this where the will of the people has time after time been defeated by factious opposition, and where the resolutions of a republican caucus that no legislation except appropriation bills shall be acted on warn us that our act cannot be passed in any other mode.

Mr. HASKELL. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. CHALMERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HASKELL. Do you state it here as the attitude of the democratic party in this House that if these bills are vetoed you propose to stop the supplies of the Government?

Mr. CHALMERS. We have no right to speak upon that subject until we know the President has so far violated the rights of American liberty as to veto an appropriation bill. [Applause.] When that is done I will be ready to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. PRICE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HASKELL. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. BELFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. CHALMERS. Oh, yes; I will yield.

A VOICE. To whom do you yield?

Mr. CHALMERS. To the whole body of them.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield first?

Mr. CHALMERS. I will yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether in the last campaign any State convention of any party in this country denied that the President of the United States might use the Army to protect the citizens at the polls or ask that these election laws should be repealed?

Mr. CHALMERS. I cannot hear the gentleman distinctly, but I answer the gentleman that the Forty-fourth Congress went before the country upon its record, and the result was a verdict in favor of its democratic policy. It was democratic policy which changed Rule 120, by which legislation is kept off from appropriation bills unless it is germane, and unless it provides for a reduction of expenditures. Thus, sir, by a simple statement of fact we strike to the ground the bold declaration of the gentleman from Ohio, that the democratic party is inaugurating new, startling, and revolutionary methods of legislation.

Again, sir, that gentleman excused himself for his change of front upon the ground that we had something back or behind that he could not agree to, and therefore he determined to resist a thing which he himself admitted was harmless if it was not right in itself. Now, sir, he says we are endeavoring to coerce him, and that he like the valiant Falstaff would yield nothing upon compulsion.

And this reminds me that another republican leader, in the committee of conference on the subject, said that he would never consent to the withdrawal of the troops from the polls, however right he might think it was in itself, because the republican party never ate humble pie; and yet in the face of these declarations they undertake to say that it is the democratic party that is endeavoring now to destroy the Government. The gentleman from Ohio, in terse and strong language, such as he always uses, told us that the second chapter of democratic revolution was now being written, and that the democratic party, who a few years ago threatened to shoot the Union to death, were now trying to starve it out of existence. The gentleman is mistaken in both chapters of his history. It was you who threatened to shoot southern men to death when they dared to leave the floor of this House, and now when they have come back by your compulsion, because a majority of the people have discarded you for your reckless violations of the trust placed in your hands, you propose to destroy the Government unless you are permitted to strangle the freedom of elections by the use of troops at the polls. [Applause.]

Mr. BELFORD. Does the gentleman state that the country has repudiated the republican party?

Mr. CHALMERS. I do, sir; and I thank God that it is true. [Applause.]

Mr. BELFORD. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the Forty-fourth Congress the democratic party had a majority of about 75 and they now have about 1. [Applause.]

Mr. CHALMERS. The gentleman is not asking a question, and I decline to yield for a speech.

Sir, it is said that the Army shall eat nothing because the republican party in its arrogance refuses to eat humble pie. You threaten to starve the Government to death because you have grown so great that you cannot even do what is right if it happens to be demanded by the majority of an opposite party.

Now, I do not believe that the Government is going to die; but if it should die from the issue now presented, upon whose shoulders will the responsibility rest? The republican party admit that they are standing upon a mere question of pride, a punctilious whim, a mere chip on the shoulder, as the gentleman from Ohio has said. The democratic party is standing upon one of the vital principles of English liberty, a principle older than the Constitution itself, a principle wrung by the English Commons from one of the English kings, a principle which has never been violated in American history except when, during the war, military necessity seemed to require it in the border States, and standing against a law never enacted in American legislation till it was deemed a military necessity in time of war. If a contest comes between the co-ordinate branches of the Government on this question, which principle should yield?

The gentleman said that before an act could become a law it must have the free consent of the House, the free consent of the Senate, and the free consent of the Executive; all these three factors are necessary to establish it. Now, if it be necessary in order to save this Government that somebody shall yield, shall the two branches of the legislative authority yield to the Executive? Shall two yield to one, or shall one yield to two? To ask these questions is to answer them before the American people. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio intimated that he wanted another appeal on this question to our great sovereign, the people. Three times already an appeal has been taken, and three times the verdict has come back in favor of the democratic party. On the first two appeals a democratic House of Representatives was returned, and in the last both a democratic House and a democratic Senate was elected. Nothing now stands in the way of the fulfillment of the popular will except a factious minority and a President who holds his seat not by the votes of the American people but by the action of returning boards and electoral commissioners who violated the will of the majority.

If free government must die, and die at the hands of such a President as this, then the democratic party can look in the face of the expiring goddess of liberty and say:

> Shake not thy gory locks at me,
> Thou canst not say I did it.

While the honorable gentleman was charging revolution upon the democratic party he gave utterance to a sentiment which showed that he and his party are determined to rule or ruin this country. Without attempting a discussion of the merits of the question, without taking back a single word that he or anybody else on his side had said about the rightfulness of this measure, he boldly and defiantly said, "You shall not compel us, you shall not coerce us, even to save this Government," and that sentiment was met with rounds of applause by gentlemen upon the other side.

To this complexion, then, has it come at last, that the majority dare not demand their rights, but we must go like humble suppliants, with hat in hand and upon bended knees, and pray the most worshipful highness of the minority to redress our grievances or this Government must die. What was meant by this threat coming from the gentleman who had just explained to us how easy it was for this Government to be destroyed without a single hostile shot being fired, and who threatened the majority upon this floor with the destruction of this Government unless the minority is permitted to control it?

Sir, that gentleman knows, as we know, that he is powerless in this House. He knows, and we know, that he and his party are powerless in the Senate. What, then, does this despotic threat mean? Before him sat the Secretary of State, and behind him sat the General of the Army, who listened, and doubtless with approbation, to this remarkable language. We know that the President and the Army furnish the only means by which the republican party can hope to carry out its threats. If, then, it was not a mere bravado, a mere galvanic shock of eloquence intended to stimulate the spinal column of the President, it was intended as a threat to this House and to the American people that if we dared to redress the most grievous wrongs by provisions placed upon appropriation bills, it would be denounced as revolutionary, and the President, with the Army and Navy at his back, would treat it as revolution. We heard but the other day the startling doctrine announced upon this floor, hitherto unheard of, that no act this Congress could pass could interfere with the constitutional power of the President to suppress insurrection. What all this means time alone can determine. Desperate men take desperate measures when despair seeks safety in crime, and the tiger when driven to its lair will not fight with more desperation than the republican party will fight to resist expulsion from power and the exposure of their official crimes.

I do not care to enter into the merits of this question any further. I simply say this: that it is absurd to contend that a refusal to permit the troops to be used at the polls to keep the peace can in any way interfere with the constitutional duty of this Government to suppress insurrection when called upon by a State.

These purposes are not only wholly different and distinct, but they cannot absolutely coexist. No election can be held in the midst of insurrection. Whenever domestic violence rises to that magnitude that the State authorities cannot suppress it, all hopes of an election are at an end. The power to suppress insurrection by United States troops when called on by the State authorities arises from and is predicated upon the fact that domestic violence has already arisen to a point where the State cannot suppress it. The power to keep the peace at the polls, on the other hand, implies that peace is existing there, and that possibly it may need to be kept.

A few words more and I have done. The gentleman from Ohio attempted to alarm the country by the despot's cry of "revolution!" Sir, the word revolution has no terrors for us. We learned to love it in our childhood days. It brings back to us that grand struggle for freedom when our revolutionary forefathers left their footprints stained with blood in the snows of Valley Forge so that we their children might take heart again whenever the hour of peril should come upon us. Military despotism now threatens us upon every side. Troops have been assembled at the polls to intimidate free people at elections. Troops have been assembled here in the Federal capital to intimidate the House of Representatives in counting the electoral vote; and the battle-cry of 1880 has already been sounded: "A government of law," not to be administered by the judiciary or by the civil power, but, as the gentleman from Ohio tells us, "a government of law, with an army strong enough to enforce it." Whenever that question arises, whenever it comes to be a question between freedom and despotism, the democratic party will be found standing where their ancestors stood in 1776.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman if the second revolution of 1861 has any terrors for him? [Laughter.]

Mr. CHALMERS. The distinguished gentleman is extremely amusing. He reminds me——

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. CHALMERS. I will, in my own way, if you please. History tells us that English kings formerly were in the habit of keeping jesters, dressed in a fool's cap and merry bells, to amuse their court. It seems that the republican Congress have supplied themselves in the same manner. [Laughter.] But instead of the fool's cap and the merry bells, which perhaps might fit very well, they have dressed their jester in swallow-tails. [Great laughter on the democratic side.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I asked the gentleman, the heroic gentleman, from Mississippi a plain, civil, simple question in response to a remark he had made. Instead of answering it, sir, the gentleman jumps upon his music-box and makes grimaces to the country and to the House. [Great laughter.]

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is mistaken in his assertion. I should certainly not undertake to usurp his occupation. I should certainly not undertake to try a game at which any monkey could beat me. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, if the discussion of this question had been confined to the simple proposition as presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and replied to by the other gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCMAHON] I should have had nothing at all to say. I should have been entirely satisfied with the presentation of the case on our side. Nothing could have been added to it by me or anybody else, and nothing could have been taken from it by any gentleman on the other side. But, sir, the discussion has, just as I expected, wandered away from that point—away from the question of whether or not the democratic House is endeavoring to coerce the executive branch of the Government. Gentlemen on the other side dare not look that issue squarely in the face. They prefer to go back to the merits of the question whether or not soldiers should be allowed to keep the peace at the polls, supposing their proposition in that respect to be a very harmless one, admitted to be harmless by many leading republicans. I do not give my assent even to this.

Two gentlemen from Mississippi have taken the floor, and I am constrained to reply, especially to the one who has just taken his seat, [Mr. CHALMERS.] I do not know how long the republicans are compelled to keep still. I do not know how long the republicans are obliged to submit to such abuse. I do not know how long we are constrained to sit here and listen to the charge that for eighteen years we have made of this Republic "a drunken despotism, reeling and reeking through the land," as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] says. I do not know how long we are to submit to the charge that the republican party has installed in this Government "a military despotism," and that the democratic party is now to restore the millennium of peace. I do not know how long we must submit to the charge that we have "debauched the Government of our country." I do not know how long we should sit quietly by and listen to the charge made by the gentleman from Mississippi that we have "converted a constitutional Union into a despotism." I do not know how long we are to remain silent while gentlemen like the gentleman from Mississippi say in effect, "You followed us and shot at us; you are the men to be forgiven—not we who fought for a constitutional Union."

I do not know whether we are compelled to listen quietly to such charges as these, and hold our voices for fear we may offend some gentleman on the other side, for fear perchance we may raise the ghost of the old "bloody shirt." Perhaps duty requires us to sit here quietly and submit to the charge of the gentleman that we have become "military despots" and "have trodden down the liberties of New York City" because we sent United States troops there to keep the peace. Perhaps we ought not to reply the fact that the gentleman's party in New York City murdered score upon score of black men before United States troops were sent there at all. I do not know but that charity, "which suffers long and is kind," requires us to acquiesce in the declaration that "to-day we are compelling an extra session of Congress." Perhaps we ought to submit in silence to being called "remorseless hyenas," and utter no word in reply. Surely, patience will some time cease to be a virtue.

Two gentlemen from Mississippi have spoken. I desire that the voice of a third gentleman from that State be heard. The language has been quoted in this House once before to-day; but I desire it to be heard by all the gentlemen on this floor.

The Clerk read as follows:

Yes, thank God, we have captured the Capitol, and in 1880 our man will walk up the White House steps and take his seat in the presidential chair. Then will our glorious triumph be complete; then will we proceed to tear your amendments from the Constitution and trample them in the mire; then will we break the shackles you have forged for the free, sovereign, and independent Commonwealths of the Union; then will we recognize the right of secession, a right that is not dead, but sleeping; then we will decorate the Capitol with the pictures of Davis and Lee and Stuart and all the glorious leaders of a cause that is not lost, but living still. Yes, thank God, we have captured the Capitol, and from that coigne of vantage we propose to rule the Republic in a way that will make your radical laws and your radical leaders forever odious in America.

Several MEMBERS. Where is that from?

Mr. FRYE. It is from a Mississippi newspaper.

Mr. SPARKS. Who is the author?

Mr. MULDROW. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will allow me to say that the two gentlemen who edit that paper do not represent in my judgment the sentiment of the democracy of Mississippi; and I would say, moreover, that one of them is a man who has "carpet-bagged" into Mississippi from Ohio within the last four years. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SPARKS. It is reported that he was a sutler in a Michigan regiment. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. The extract just read is from the Southern States, a paper published at Okalona, Mississippi. Hon. J. R. Clymer, a leading democrat of the State of Ohio, as everybody will admit, says in a letter addressed to the editors of that paper:

I am greatly pleased with the States, in its peerless ability and conscientious devotion to principle. Brother Harper and you both wield trenchant and powerful blades. The cause of Jeffersonian democracy needs such men who have the brain to plan and the brawn to strike. Even a northern democrat approves the spirit of this southern paper, which marks out the democratic programme after 1880.

Mr. WARNER. Allow me to ask the gentleman who is the writer of the language just read?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. J. R. Clymer, of Ohio.

Mr. WARNER. He may be a distinguished gentleman; but I have never heard of him. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. He is an older democrat than the gentleman is.

Mr. WARNER. That is possible; but that he is a better one I deny.

Mr. FRYE. Now, the gentleman from Mississippi simply takes up the refrain of the Okalona States, and in the spirit of his speech, and in his manner, declares to the country and to the House: We of the democratic party have "captured the Capitol;" we have "captured your Capitol!" Why, gentlemen, we have heard that cry again and again and again, when you have been nearer to it than to-day, and you have never put your hands upon the Capitol, and under God you never will. [Applause.]

In 1832 South Carolina thought she had "captured the Capitol." She issued her proclamation and enacted her laws and then went to raising her army. But General Jackson was occupying the capital of this country, and he stamped his iron heel on nullification and it disappeared. South Carolina's rebellion was over, and she did not "capture the Capitol."

Again, in 1854, I wish to call your attention to a very remarkable scene. It was in the streets of Boston. It was on Brattle street, named for a revolutionary patriot. It was in the sight of old Faneuil Hall. It was in sight of Brattle-street church, with its iron ball in its face in token of its revolutionary history and life. It was in that grand old Commonwealth, in the very bosom of it, which gave birth to liberty. A black man was lured out of a store by a lie and eight white men took him in the street in their arms and carried him to the jail.

Scene second——

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Was that the time that Attorney-General Devens was marshal of Boston and had charge of that prisoner? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FRYE. No, sir.

Second scene:

The court-house, an immense pile of stone, resembling, in its massive strength, a donjon keep of the Middle Ages, wore the air of a beleaguered fortress. At the windows in different stories of the building the mingled soldiery of Massachusetts and of the United States presented themselves, with fire-arms, as at the embrasures of a rampart. Below, a vast throng of citizens, which had been constantly increasing from early dawn, surged around the base of the building and through the spacious square in unappeasable excitement. All the outer entrances of the court-house had been securely closed, except one at which was stationed a strong force of police. Even here, none were allowed to enter but the functionaries, the reporters for the press, and a few citizens who, by special favor, had obtained permits from the marshal. Once within the walls, it was not certain that the adventurous citizen would be able to make his way to the tribunal. At the foot of the stairs leading to the court-room files of soldiers barred the passage with their muskets, and raised them only at the nod of a custom-house officer deputed for the service. On the first landing place were stationed more soldiers with fixed bayonets, and others still at the head of the stairs. So strictly was the guard maintained, that those who had passed the first sentries were, in some instances, arrested and detained upon the stairway by the last. And not until the last moment before the opening of the court were any except the officials allowed to pass. Never before, in the history of Massachusetts, had the avenues to a tribunal of justice been so obstructed by serried bayonets borne in the hands of an alien and mercenary soldiery.

Another scene:

Arrayed in this holiday garb, the colored man was conducted for the last time into the United States court-room. Since Wednesday night a double guard had been placed over him, and they now attended him to the dock. Increased precautionary measures besides had been provided by the marshal. Soldiers with fixed bayonets filled all the avenues, and bullies armed with bludgeons and pistols crowded the court-room. One at a time members of the bar, reporters for the press, friends of the prisoner, and favored citizens defiled beneath crossed bayonets and occupied their places.

One more scene:

The people had been swept out of the square and stood crowded together in Court street, presenting to the eye a solid rampart of living beings. At the eastern door of the court-house stood the cannon, loaded, and with its mouth pointed full upon the compact mass. By its side stood the officer commanding the detachment of the United States troops, gazing with steady composure in the same direction. It was the first time that the armed power of the United States had ever been arrayed against the people of Massachusetts. Men who witnessed the sight and reflected upon its cause were made painfully to recognize the fact, before unfelt, that they were the subjects of two governments.

Again:

First came a detachment of United States artillery, followed by a platoon of United States marines. After these followed the armed civil posse of the marshal, to which succeeded two platoons of marines. The cannon, guarded by another platoon of marines, brought up the rear. When this arrangement was completed the poor negro, accompanied by an officer on each side, with arms interlocked, was conducted from his prison through a passage lined with soldiers, and placed in the center of the armed posse.

One more scene:

Opposite the custom-house the column turned at a right angle into another street. This cross-movement suddenly checked the long line of spectators which had been pressing down State street parallel with the other body; but the rear portion, not understanding the nature of the obstruction, continued to press forward, and forced the front from the sidewalk into the middle of the street. To the chafed and watchful military this movement wore the aspect of an assault on the cortege. Instantly some lancers, stationed near, rode their horses furiously at the surging crowd and hacked with their sabers upon the defenseless heads within their reach. Immediately after a detachment of infantry charged upon the dense mass, at a run, with fixed bayonets. Some were pitched headlong down the cellarways, some were forced into the passages and up flights of stairs, and others were overthrown upon the pavement, bruised and wounded.

Final scene: A ship in the bay; United States soldiers and marines, the loaded cannon, the colored man, all on board; the white-winged sails are spread; and Anthony Burns is remanded into slavery!

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Not now.

Mr. HERBERT. I merely desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FRYE. Not now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine declines to yield.

Mr. FRYE. And when this poor fellow, Burns, to take whom eleven hundred Massachusetts soldiers had been mustered into the United States service, to take whom company after company of United States troops and marines had been used, to take whom a cannon loaded to the muzzle had been pointed at the court-house and its approaches, to take whom lies even, added to all this, had been necessary; when, I say, this poor fellow was landed in Virginia, bonfires were kindled, huzzas filled the air all over the South, a glorious triumph had been achieved, the southern heart was full of glory and joy, because the Constitution of their country was supreme and the law of the land had been vindicated. Oh, magnificent sight! Oh, glorious spectacle in free America! Oh, humiliating spectacle! The whole South jubilant at such a triumph, at such supremacy of law, at such vindication of the Constitution, and yet it was accomplished only by the use of United States troops, under the command of United States officers.

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARLISLE. Does not the gentleman know that the troops were used on that occasion to assist the marshal in executing the process issued by a United States commissioner in pursuance of a United States law, and that they were not used for the purpose of enforcing the laws of the State or preserving the peace of the State? And I desire further, while I am on my feet, to ask the gentleman the additional question whether he is opposed to the use of the United States Army when it may become necessary to assist United States marshals in executing a process issued by the United States courts?

Mr. FRYE. I will reply to the questions of the gentleman before I am through and not at the moment he has asked me.

There never was a time perhaps when the South was nearer "capturing the Capitol" of our country than it was then; and hundreds and thousands in this free Republic came to believe that when the old Commonwealth of Massachusetts had been thus humiliated, had thus placed her face in the dust and clothed herself with sackcloth and ashes, thousands of men believed that the Capitol of our country had been captured. Gentlemen from the South believed it; and then they turned upon us and sent upon us demand after demand in quick and rapid succession, and we, in our humiliation, in as rapid a succession, yielded until they, in their pride of power, asked too much. And then the solid North said to them: "Not one single step further. When you demand this thing of us, is thy servant a dog that he shall do it?" "Thy servant" up to that time was thy servant no longer. And then war—four years of it—not brought on by poor old John Brown, at Harper's Ferry, who frightened the whole State of Virginia into hysterics with fifteen men and some old muskets—war, serious war, where hundreds of thousands of men were marshaled on either side; war in which you men of the South were again striving to "capture the Capitol."

And at one time you were right over here on these heights; our troops were coming toward the capital defeated, in disorder, in disarray, and your hands were right on the capital of your country. Why did you not take it? I tell you, my friends, there is a God rules over the affairs of nations as well as over the affairs of individual men. Four years of war, and then down under a little apple-tree at Appomattox General Grant, with a magnanimity such as this world never saw before in man, said to the conquered soldiers of the South, "Go home in peace, be good citizens, and I will take care of you." And you did not capture the capital of your country. [Applause.]

But this war had a logic attached to it, and by that logic Burns became a free man—ay, more, he became an American citizen; ay, more, he was clothed with all the rights that the men were clothed with who with a lying mouth lured him out from the store on Brattle street, where he was in safety; but then you determined he should not have the right to vote or he should not exercise it. You would not submit that the man whom six months before, if there had been no war, you could have compelled me to have hunted down like a dog—you would not submit that that poor hunted fellow should be permitted to stand beside the ballot-box with you and cast his ballot as a freeman and an American citizen. What then? There were ku klux, there were white leagues, there were white-liners, and you slaughtered in cold blood hundreds—ay, thousands, of these same poor black men—men whom, when you were in the war, when you were away from your plantations, you left your families with, and who never betrayed the trust; men who worked in the fields and raised supplies, while you men who could carry the musket and the sword and the bayonet were permitted to fight the battles, as you said, of your country.

I say that the history has been written. No man can contradict it. There is piled up in this Capitol by the ton evidence which is uncontradicted; and history has been written with a pen of iron; and if you men do not know it, your children when they read it will put their faces in their hands and their hands in the dust. You murdered these men by the thousand. What then? A few troops were sent into the South, not numbering over twelve hundred, south of Mason and Dixon's line; a score or so in a great country in a voting precinct, in charge of a lieutenant, not within two miles of a polling-place. I had occasion to investigate this with a great deal of care in Louisiana, and the investigation did not show one single instance where a soldier had been at a polling-place interfering with the voters; on the contrary, their orders were not to move from their quarters without orders from the officer in command, and then only to keep the peace.

They kept the peace; singularly enough a score of "blue coats" and blue pantaloons could take care of the ku klux, and white-leaguers and white-liners. They kept the peace, and colored men were permitted to vote, and the republican party carried State after State in the South. And then, sir, what followed? Those troops were withdrawn from the sacred soil of the South, except where the sacred soil demanded protection from the Mexican raiders. The troops were withdrawn, the South demanded it, and the result of the withdrawal was a "solid" South—a solid South once more. We see it here.

There were a half dozen dusky faces in this House in the last Congress. Where are the dusky faces now? You say that the places that knew them once shall know them no more forever. Why? Because you have "captured the Capitol," and you say that you will keep it. You say that no troops shall be used at the polls to keep the peace, and that the solid South will continue solid.

The gentleman from Mississippi says that he knows that this provision could not be passed unless it was put upon an appropriation bill. You have placed it there, and the Army bill cannot become a law without this being enacted too. What is your position? You say we are a solid South, and we will be a solid South. You cannot have the troops withdrawn and prevent them from keeping the peace at the polls, thus affording protection to the voters, unless you put this provision on an appropriation bill and then compel its enactment by starving the United States Army. There being no other way open to do it we will do it in this way, because the South must be solid. But, my friends, a solid South is not enough. It will not do. You have been solid before and did not capture the Capitol. [Applause.] A solid South will not do it.

What else? New York must come to her rescue. With a solid South and New York, then you will have "captured the Capitol." Now, you know perfectly well that for more than fifteen years before 1870 the State of New York was carried by fraud, by corruption, by ballot-stuffing, by repeating, by the importation of strangers in its chief city, New York. You know that such a thing as a pure election in that city was utterly unknown. You know that in 1868, when it was given out by Samuel J. Tilden, who is to be your next leader in the capture of the Capitol—you know that under his lead more than thirty thousand fraudulent votes were thrown in the city of New York. You know that there was repeating by the thousands and thousands, because one of your own leaders a few years since charged it home to Mr. Tilden, and spread the record of it before you. I refer to Mr. Greeley. Now, knowing all these things, knowing that you have heretofore carried the State by ten thousand majority with the aid of thirty thousand fraudulent votes in the city, knowing that Samuel J. Tilden is the man who managed the machinery of that election, you know that if you can repeal the election laws upon our statute-book and give Tilden free course you can carry the State of New York by ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand majority, and if you have carried New York, with the solid South and one or two other States perhaps, you have no doubt that you have "captured the Capitol" of your country once more. You have not got it yet.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] should not act so triumphant. You have this House, but you have it by a very small majority indeed. You must keep very well and have very few absentees to hold it. You must be very attentive to business to keep control.

You have the Senate, I am aware of that, but thank God you have not the Executive yet. [Applause.] My judgment is, gentlemen, when you think you will have him by threatening you are making a profound mistake. You may have begged, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] said, on bended knee, of him the withdrawal of the troops from the South, but do not presume too much. Do not presume because you succeeded in that you can go to him, with a pistol in your hand, demanding what you wish, with hope of success. [Loud cries of "Oh!" "Oh!" and laughter on the democratic side of the House.] A beggar may succeed and a highwayman fail.

It is said, gentlemen, that those who win should laugh. Now, do not laugh till you have won. You have not won yet. You are still in a state of glorious uncertainty. You have not repealed the law affording protection to voters at the polls yet. You have not repealed the election laws yet, and you will not repeal them until you have removed the present Executive from his chair. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, you are standing close by the Capitol, I admit, but not so close as you stood over here in Virginia when your troops were following ours after Bull Run. The Captol is not in so much danger as it was then, but you are standing dangerously near, and that hand of yours is outstretched now, thank God, not a bloody one. It will never again be a bloody one. You have a better opinion of Northern men than you had twenty years ago, and you will seek no more blood, but your hand is stretched out now apparently ready to grasp the crown. Gentlemen, the angel of God will touch that hand and it will wither. [Applause.]

Mr. HOUSE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSE. Do I understand the gentleman to be in favor of retaining on the statute-book the law which permits the Army to be used to keep the peace at the polls? Does he advocate that law? Is he in favor of it? Does he believe in its constitutionality?

Mr. FRYE. I have not a shadow of doubt about its constitutionality; and until I become satisfied that in the South negroes will not be murdered when they attempt to vote, I am in favor of keeping this law upon the statute-book and the troops near the polls. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. CONGER. Now ask another question. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] say what he means by "murders in the South?" Will he specify any particular section of country in which he alleges those things to have taken place?

Mr. FRYE. Why, does the gentleman desire me to write a book? It would take a book merely to inventory the murders in the South for political purposes.

Mr. STEELE. Tell me whether you charge these things to have taken place in the State of North Carolina? [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. Well, I am not so certain about North Carolina. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. There have been more murders in Philadelphia than there have occurred in elections in North Carolina since it has been a State.

Mr. FRYE. And the reason why I am not certain about North Carolina is that it is very nearly a republican State. It is dangerous to shoot men for voting where there is a good large party of white men on the other side.

Mr. STEELE. Then I understand you not to allege that these things have occurred in North Carolina, and the reason you give is that they are afraid to do it because there are white republicans there. Is that it?

A MEMBER. That is about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. I should not wish to say that, because I do not know that there have ever been any murders for political purposes in North Carolina.

Mr. STEELE. Well, I am done now. [Laughter.]

Mr. HURD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order, so that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] can be heard.

Mr. FRYE. Have I not some time left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty minutes of his hour remaining; but as the gentleman did not appear to claim his time, another gentleman has been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. FRYE. I had agreed to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] for some questions.

Mr. HURD. I will not claim the floor now.

Mr. CARLISLE. The question I desired to propound to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] was whether he did not know that the United States troops were used in the city of Boston in 1854 to assist the United States marshal in executing a process issued by a United States commissioner under authority of a United States statute?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARLISLE. And whether or not he is opposed to such use of troops when it becomes necessary?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir. Now your next question.

Mr. CARLISLE. That is all. In putting my question I stated that that was quite a different thing from the use of the United States Army to enforce the laws of a State or to preserve peace in a State.

Mr. FRYE. That is the very point. I do not claim for one moment that the United States should keep armies to enforce the laws of a State, but to enforce the laws of the United States and rights under the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees to citizens, at any rate when voting for United States officers, that they shall be permitted to cast their ballots freely and without coercion.

Mr. CARLISLE. Does the gentleman know of any law of the United States which prohibits or undertakes to punish assaults and batteries committed in a State, or even murders committed in a State?

Mr. FRYE. I know that the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States guarantee to every citizen the right to vote.

Mr. CARLISLE. I say that there is no provision of the Constitution of the United States which guarantees the right to vote to any citizen, and the gentleman cannot find it.

Mr. FRYE. And no law which guarantees the right to vote to American citizens for members of Congress?

Mr. CARLISLE. There is no law of the United States which guarantees to any citizen the right to vote.

Mr. FRYE. What of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. CARLISLE. I will tell the gentleman if he will allow me. It is well settled, and gentlemen who assail the position must overthrow at least three solemn decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that the Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon a human being. The only effect of the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution is to protect a certain class of citizens of the United States against discrimination by a State in the right to vote, on account of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. FRYE. I so understand it.

Mr. CARLISLE. Therefore the Supreme Court expressly decides that that amendment does not confer the right of suffrage; but that the States still have the power to deprive the colored citizen of the right of suffrage for any other reason than his race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and in the State of Rhode Island to-day colored citizens are deprived of the right of suffrage if they do not possess a certain property qualification. And in the State of Massachusetts—I speak of these because they are New England States and republican States—many colored citizens are deprived of the right of suffrage because they cannot read the Constitution in the English language and cannot write their names, and because they have not paid all the taxes assessed against them within two years preceding the day of election. And so it may be in any State. Therefore the proposition is perfectly clear that the Constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any human being or guaranteed that right to any human being, but has left the whole subject to be regulated by the several States, with the limitation, however, under the fifteenth amendment, that they shall not deny or abridge the right on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the third and fourth sections of the act of May 31, 1870, which undertakes to protect the citizen in his right to vote without regard to the reasons upon which any person might attempt to prevent him from doing so were unconstitutional and void.

Mr. FRYE. I have never made any question about what the constitutional amendments mean and what the construction put upon them by the courts has been; but I presume the gentleman from Kentucky does not pretend that it is within the power of any State to discriminate against a colored man in reference to his right to vote because he is a colored man or because he has been a slave. Does not the gentleman admit that the Congress of the United States in legislating with reference to the election of Representatives to Congress can make laws affecting the manner and method of that election? If there is an attempt on the part of any one to prevent colored men from voting at such elections, cannot the United States constitutionally pass laws to prevent such interference, and cannot the United States provide that troops be used to enforce the laws, if necessary, and to keep the peace at the polls, just as it is provided here?

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman has asked me so many questions at once that I am not sure I can remember them all; but I will answer them as well as I can. I admit that under the provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to make or alter regulations respecting the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, except as to the places of choosing Senators, it is competent for Congress to regulate the manner of holding such elections. But that is a power of the most narrow and restricted character. It does not touch the substance of the election at all; it does not touch the elective franchise at all; it relates to the mere form, method, mode, or manner of conducting the election itself. If there were now upon the statute-book a law authorizing the use of United States soldiers when necessary in order to protect the colored citizen against discrimination by a State in reference to his right to vote, on account of his color or previous condition, the gentleman's question might be pertinent. But the existing law is as broad and comprehensive as the English language can make it. Under that statute the President of the United States or any subordinate military commander may send soldiers into a State to keep the peace at a mere municipal election, having no connection whatever with the selection of a member of Congress or even with the selection of any general State officer.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman from Maine allow me to read a clause of the Constitution?

Mr. FRYE. I call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to section 5522 of the Revised Statutes:

> Every person, whether with or without any authority, power, or process, or pretended authority, power, or process, of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, &c.

Now does the gentleman assert that under the Constitution we had not the right to enact that law?

Mr. CARLISLE. "Obstruct and hinder" whom? Read the rest of the section.

Mr. FRYE. Why obstruct or hinder any one in the exercise of the right to vote.

Mr. CARLISLE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Let him read the section.

Mr. FRYE. The section continues—

> Who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation, or otherwise, interferes with or prevents the supervisors of election, or either of them——

Mr. CARLISLE. Ah! that is it. [Laughter on the democratic side.]

Mr. FRYE. Hold on till I read further:

> Or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or either of them.

It is too long for me to read the whole of it; but does not the gentleman know that there are other sections here for the enforcement of the law by marshals, deputy marshals, and supervisors, all of which sections go to affect, not the right to vote, but the power of men to vote freely at the polls?

Mr. CARLISLE. Why, does not the gentleman know that when a deputy marshal is sent to the polls with the power to arrest a citizen instantly, with or without process, not because he has voted illegally, but because the marshal thinks he is about to vote illegally, this is practically conferring upon that officer the absolute power of udging finally and conclusively of the man's qualification as a voter, and that if a man is thus seized under that statute and carried away from the polling place and kept until the election is over, he is deprived of his right of suffrage?

Mr. FRYE. That is an entirely different question. That is not done. When men have been arrested at polling places, it has not been for the crime of voting against law, but for the crime of false registration. That was the case in every instance in New York City.

Mr. CARLISLE. Now my friend from Maine says these men have been arrested in the cases put by him, not for attempting to vote illegally, but for false registration, and in all the instances which I have now in my mind, and they are those disclosed by the investigation of the committee of which the gentleman was himself a member, the arrests were not made between the time of registration and the time of voting, but the warrants were issued on the night before the election, placed in the hands of the supervisors, and when the citizen came to the poll to vote the process was placed in the hands of the deputy marshals at the polls and the citizen was then arrested and carried off.

Mr. FRYE. If the gentleman will pardon me a moment, that was done, Mr. Chairman, in almost every instance I can remember, because the men could not be found. These men were "repeaters," and falsely registered their names. The only place they could be found was when they came to the polls to vote, and there the warrants were put by the marshals into the hands of one of the supervisors, and he was instructed to hold them in his hands until the man appeared and offered to vote, and then, when he did so, to give the warrant to the marshal, and the marshal was to arrest him.

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman does not mean to say these men were not arrested on account of what was alleged to be a defect in their naturalization papers?

Mr. FRYE. Under which they had no right to register.

Mr. CARLISLE. And every man who did register was required to give the street and number of his residence, and the United States marshal could find him before the day of election as well as on the day of election if he desired it.

Mr. FRYE. Does not the gentleman know that in that election in the city of New York in 1868 one hundred and forty-two men gave their residences and the numbers of their residences in one single block, and the officer going to the place found there was no block there? [Laughter.]

Mr. CARLISLE. I am not talking about the arrest of men for repeating; I am talking about the arrest of men on account of an alleged defect in their naturalization papers, men who, according to the decision of the State courts and according to the decision of the United States circuit court, were as fully qualified to vote as the gentleman from Maine or myself.

Mr. FRYE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been doing a wrong to another gentleman, to whom I promised to yield a portion of my time.

Mr. CARLISLE. I am much obliged to the gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the time which has been occupied by the gentleman from Kentucky will be allowed me to yield to another gentleman, to whom I promised to yield a portion of my time.

Mr. CARLISLE. I hope that will be done.

Mr. SPARKS. How much time has the gentleman left?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. HOOKER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a single inquiry before he takes his seat?

Mr. FRYE. I am afraid it will get me into more difficulty.

Mr. HOOKER. No, it will not.

Mr. FRYE. Well, go on.

Mr. HOOKER. You have expressed your regret that the half dozen colored men who sat on that side of the House last year were not here now. Will you not admit the fact that in your own State of Maine and in the State of Massachusetts you have reared and educated some of the most intelligent colored men who ever lived in this country? Then how does it happen in all your history you never thought enough of them to send one of them here to represent you? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman must ask the people that question. The people seemed to prefer to elect somebody else. [Laughter.] I yield now, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Washington Territory the remaining portion of my time.

Mr. SPARKS. How much time has the gentleman left?

The CHAIRMAN. He has fifteen minutes to yield.

Mr. SAMFORD. I ask the gentleman from Maine to yield to me for one moment.

Mr. FRYE. I cannot.

Mr. SAMFORD. I only wish to say that what the gentleman from Maine has said in reference to murders in the South so far as the third district of Alabama is concerned is unfounded in fact. [Laughter and applause.] I trust the gentleman did not profess to speak from his personal knowledge or attempt to state that from his personal knowledge those things were done in that district.

Mr. FRYE. I am glad to learn, Mr. Chairman, there is one State and one district South where they did not murder colored men.

Mr. SAMFORD. If the gentleman withdraws his statement with reference to that State and that district it is all I want.

Mr. FRYE. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. BRENTS. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend, at the outset, to participate in this debate. A new member of this House, and the humble representative of only a Territory, a mere beggar for congressional favors, it would be presumptuous and unbecoming in me to attempt by anything I might say to influence legislation unless it affects the material well-being of my locality or the general welfare of the entire nation. Moved by these considerations, and with no design in this, my maiden effort on this floor and in presence of "the assembled wisdom of the nation," to discuss at any considerable length the great and vital principles involved in the pending measure, I shall only attempt in a few brief and faulty sentences to present but imperfectly some considerations which I think should, and I sincerely hope will, control to some extent the action of this body in the premises.

Whatever may be the merits or demerits of the amendments to sections 2002 and 5528 of the Revised Statutes sought to be incorporated into this bill—whether they are wise, politic, just, and wholesome, or unwise, impolitic, unjust, and unwholesome—it is quite certain those provisions will produce a great, important, and vital change in the settled and established law of this country. The first of those sections, 2002, is proscriptive and restrictive of the pre-existing common right and power as well as duty of military, naval, and civil officers of the nation, to order, take, and have those under their control at all times where, in their opinion and judgment, the public service and weal might most require their presence. The other one, 5528, simply makes the first, 2002, operative by denouncing the penalty for its violation. By these two sections of the Revised Statutes this anterior right, power, and duty is abridged so that it can only be exercised at a place where a general or special election is being held, which, of course, is in every ward and neighborhood in the United States, and of frequent occurrence in only two cases, videlicit: first, when "it is necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States;" and, secondly, when it is necessary "to keep the peace at the polls."

These, then, are the only emergencies, as the law now stands, that justify the presence of any troops, or even a body of armed civilians under a civil officer, for a lawful purpose, such as a marshal and his posse, at a national election. Gentlemen now propose, by the elimination and repeal of the latter of these two saving clauses to this abrogatory statute, to still further narrow, restrict, abridge, and repeal the pre-existing law and to further circumscribe its operation. By this they seek to not only excuse and exonerate every such officer from quelling a riot wherever and whenever it may occur in his jurisdiction, but also to visit him with condign punishment if he shall have any armed men at an election for the purpose of keeping peace at the polls, even though riot, tumult, intimidation, and murder may be rampant, and it be the only means of protecting citizens of the United States in the exercise of their constitutional right to vote their will. All effective protection by the nation to its citizens in the exercise of the elective franchise, the constitutional instrument of self-government, is in hot haste to be swept away, and red-handed bulldozers at each recurring election are to be "loosed for a season" to hold high carnival, with "none to molest or make them afraid." And this all in the interest of free and fair elections! All to prevent those military, naval, and civil officers from intimidating voters in violation of their official duty and oath and under stringent and heavy penalties, when no instance is cited of such an improbable occurrence!

Now, Mr. Chairman, whether this most radical and far-reaching change in the law of the land is desirable or not; whether it is conducive to fair, free, and pure elections and good government; whether it is protective of our republican institutions, or whether it will be promotive of the success and permanency of this political party or that, I need not now discuss. It should be sufficient for Representatives to know that men, statesmen, patriots, political parties, and even the different branches of the Government are, or possibly may be, divided in opinion as to the propriety of the measure. But for this diversity of opinion, and the tenacity with which it was held by members of the respective Houses of the last Congress, the people of this country would have been spared the expense and disquietude occasioned by this extra session. Shall we repeat the experiment, whose failure was the very cause of our now being convened, and keep the country in suspense, agitation, and turmoil? We are told, however, that since that unfortunate experiment was tried the political complexion of the other branch of Congress has changed, and that the sentiment of both Houses is in accord upon this question. Moreover, it is claimed by some gentlemen, I believe, that the President also sanctions the contemplated change; or, at least, it is insisted that no one has a right to presume that his views are adverse to those of the majority of both Houses of Congress. Some gentlemen even go further and contend that the majority of the two Houses of Congress reflect the will of the people, and may pass such laws as they wish so long as they are not in and of themselves repugnant to constitutional inhibitions, regardless of the views entertained by the President.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen are warranted in the assumption that this measure meets the approbation of a majority of both Houses of Congress and of the Executive, what excuse can be offered for tacking it to this appropriation bill? Why not pass it as an independent measure by the ordinary, legitimate, and constitutional methods of legislation? Then the people, if such legislation be really according to their will, would respond when the news reaches them, "Well done, good and faithful servants." If it be so worthy and meritorious a measure, if it has sufficient inherent strength to pass the legislative ordeal in the usual way, why adopt this unusual, indirect, and questionable course? By so doing these gentlemen unwittingly confess the insincerity of these pretensions. By so doing they assume that probably it would not receive the concurrent sanction of a majority of the Senate and the approval of the President. They certainly have no right to assume the contrary; the Constitution does not permit them to assume that, and to pursue a course that virtually gives them no opportunity to exercise a free and untrammeled dissent according to their conscientious convictions.

Neither have gentlemen a right, Mr. Chairman, either in the light of the Constitution or of our past political history and experience, to arrogate to the majority of Congress the concentrated embodiment of the popular will. The fathers, in their wisdom, to prevent the popular will from being thwarted and overridden by the impetuosity of a bare majority of Congress, inserted in the Constitution these wholesome provisions:

SECTION VII.

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House, it shall become a law. But in all cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each House respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

In the eye of the Constitution, therefore, that can only be received as the expression of the popular will in legislation which has the independent approval of a majority of each House and of the President, or of two-thirds of each House without the President's approval. No distinction is made by these provisions between constitutional and unconstitutional measures. The language is broad and comprehensive, and applies to all laws alike. Indeed, an unconstitutional law would be void without the President's veto, and his approval certainly could not validate it. But, again, the argument of these gentlemen proves too much in another direction. It proves, if sound, that every bill which is neither approved by the President nor passed by a two-third vote of both Houses is, therefore, unconstitutional. Besides, as a matter of fact, of experience, and of history, we cannot confidently affirm that the majority of the two Houses unerringly declare in their legislation the popular will. Many measures that have passed both Houses and have been defeated by the firm exercise of the veto power have received the stinging condemnation of the people. Notable among the numerous instances of this fact may be cited the bank and tariff bills, vetoed by President Jackson, and for which the people re-elected him.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind the attempt here being made to tack to an appropriation bill for the support of an important and essential branch of the public service, to be towed through the legislative channel, a measure so vital in its operation and about the policy of which public opinion is so much divided, if successful, must prove a precedent of most pernicious and troublesome tendency. No apology can be made for the inauguration of such practice in legislative action, except to those who hold the baneful doctrine of false ethics that "the end justifies the means;" who would therefore kill every person as soon as converted lest he backslide and fail of salvation. The ultimate object of those who resort to it must be apparent to every thinking mind. Evidently it must be to disarrange that constitutional distribution and adjustment of governmental powers planned so wisely and so well by the fathers; to break away from all the constitutional checks upon hasty, impulsive, and inconsiderate legislation; to wrest from the President his constitutional prerogative and to subjugate him in the performance of his constitutional functions to the imperious will of the majority of Congress; to destroy the constitutional balances and disturb the equilibrium of our legislative machinery, and eventually to concentrate within the popular branch of our National Legislature all the combined powers of government. It is the "rule-or-ruin" doctrine put into practice. The result of persistence in it is as certain as the laws of cause and effect; as sure as that nightfall treads on the heels of the setting sun. It is utterly subversive of the Constitution and revolutionary in the extreme, whether the President signs or refuses.

Already, Mr. Chairman, the Army has been reduced to twenty-five thousand men. This is a mere handful for the defense and protection of a nation of fifty millions of people, with a domain of nearly four million square miles in area. But even since this bill has been under consideration, an attempt has been made to further reduce it to only fifteen thousand. Gentlemen talk about the Army being too top-heavy. They are mistaken. It is too bottom-light. The rank and file should be increased to at least fifty thousand men, provided with all necessary supplies. The meager force we now have, even when fully equipped and provisioned, is sadly inadequate to protect our frontier settlers from Indian depredations and butcheries.

Mr. Chairman, I feel a deep interest in this matter, and the people whom I have the honor to represent feel a deep interest in it. For two successive years they have suffered most severely from the raids of hostile Indians. Less than two years ago we had the Nez Percé war, wherein Chief Joseph and his warriors defied the Army of the United States, composed of brave officers and well-disciplined men, aided by the noble and gallant volunteers of Idaho and Washington, until scores of good citizens had been murdered and scalped, hundreds of families frightened and driven from their homes to the denser settlements, and the country laid waste for hundreds of miles. Why was it so? Because the troops were too few in number, and were almost totally without supplies. The epidemic of retrenchment, economy, and reform had been raging here, griping and cramping members of this House worse than an attack of Asiatic cholera, from which they have not even convalesced, much less recovered, even yet. Last summer we had a repetition of these heart-sickening scenes, caused by the Bannock war, by Egan and Buffalo Horn and their warriors.

Why was it? Simply because Congress had failed to make suitable and necessary appropriations for the support and transportation of the Army, and because the field of operations was too extensive for the number of which it was composed.

Even while I speak, Mr. Chairman, the people of the eastern part of my Territory are daily and hourly expecting another Indian outbreak; and the Army, under this penny-wise-and-pound-foolish policy—on account of this economy which never buys the "ounce of prevention"—is now too weak and too poorly supplied to render adequate protection. And now, Mr. Chairman, with these facts before their eyes gentlemen on this floor propose to further destroy the effectiveness of the Army by making its pay and all its supplies dependent upon the passage through the Senate and the approval by the President of this measure for the amendment of the two sections of the Revised Statutes already mentioned.

Should the President honestly and conscientiously disapprove of the measure, then he must either violate his oath and duty under the Constitution or the Army must be denied supplies for the ensuing year. No other alternative; and either leads inevitably to the same result. Either must ultimately annihilate the Constitution and revolutionize the Government. Every one of us, at the beginning of this session, solemnly swore to "support the Constitution of the United States." Some of us further swore that we had "never borne arms against the United States." More than half of our friends across the aisle could not take that oath. Before that some of them had sworn to support it, and had afterward taken up arms and tried to destroy it. All of them, however, now claim to be devotedly attached to, and the especial champions of, that sacred instrument. I have often wondered why those gentlemen do not apply for a patent on it, securing them in the sole right to interpret and use it. Only a few days ago a distinguished Senator from Kentucky, and an acknowledged leader of the political party to which these gentlemen belong, declared on the floor of the Senate that the Constitution of the United States, and not King Caucus, is the sovereign of that great party.

As loyal subjects of that great sovereign, may we not hope that all the members of that party, casting off the shackles put upon them by King Caucus and joining those who seek to purge this bill of this unconstitutional and revolutionary feature, will show the sincerity of their professions of loyalty to the Government and Constitution of the United States? And may we not further hope that every member on this floor, of every party, and every citizen of this great nation, will vie with each other in patriotic emulation and loyal reverence of that instrument while life continues; and at last, as he leaves the shore of time, that he may wave back over the dark waters, in the sight of coming generations, a banner of light, bearing the golden inscription: The Constitution—esto perpetua.

Mr. HURD. Mr. Chairman, by the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution it is provided that—

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

In the Forty-fifth Congress the House of Representatives, in the exercise of its unquestioned power, passed the Army bill and the legislative bill, appropriating nearly fifty millions of money for the uses of the Government. To those bills they added certain provisions germane to their subject-matter and in the interest of economy, which repealed provisions of the existing statutes, most of which had been incorporated into the law of the land by being in the first instance attached to appropriation bills. These bills, when sent to the Senate, were amended, as that body had the undoubted power to do, by striking out the provisions to which I have referred. They went to committees of conference. Not having been a member of one of the committees of conference, nor familiar with the necessities of legislation at that time pending, I am unable to say what the propositions for settlement and adjustment of the differences between the two Houses were. I have heard it said upon the floor of this House that certain distinguished representatives of the republican party were willing to concede very much to the wishes of the House, only insisting that one of the provisions should be stricken out. These gentlemen had not power to speak for the body which differed with this House; and I do not know that any proposition was made by the Senate of the United States for a compromise. I do know that as a result of the disagreement of the committees of conference an extra session was called. I will not now discuss the question as to who is to be blamed for the extra session, excepting in the general discussion of the propositions that are involved in this debate. If the House were right in insisting upon these provisions, then the Senate was wrong in compelling an extra session. If the Senate were right in refusing to accept the propositions of the House, then the House was wrong; and I propose, in the few remarks that I shall submit to the consideration of this body to-day, to attempt to show that the House was right in every proposition which it insisted upon in the Forty-fifth Congress and which it is now insisted shall be adopted in the legislation of the Forty-sixth.

Nor shall I discuss the method by which these amendments or provisions have been attempted to be made parts of the appropriation bills. If anything has been settled by the legislation of the last quarter of a century it is that even general legislation may be tacked to appropriation bills; and certainly no man at any time in the history of this Government has disputed the proposition that measures in the interest of economy, propositions relating to the revenue, such as these are, might be incorporated into bills when they were originated by the House under the authority of the section to which I have referred.

Who was right? Who is right now? I say, Mr. Chairman, that the House of Representatives was right in insisting that these bills should be repealed. I shall not speak to-day of the test-oath bill. I shall speak only of the two others which relate to elections, because they both are governed by the same principles and both must be settled by the same constitutional doctrine.

The House of Representatives insisted that the law should be amended so as to strike out that part which authorized the use of troops at the polls; that the law should be amended so that supervisors of elections appointed by Federal authority should no longer possess the power they now have; and that there should be a repeal of all the statutes which conferred upon officers of the United States the power to interfere with or regulate State elections. The House was right and it is right in the demand it makes now, because, first, these provisions are unconstitutional. They interfere with the right of suffrage; they attempt the control of voting in a State in the Union where by the laws of the State the voting power alone is conferred. Have gentlemen who have considered this question read recently section 2, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that—

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

It is the constitution of the State that determines the qualifications of electors and not the Constitution of the United States. There is no such thing as the right of suffrage for a citizen of the United States as such. The right of suffrage is possessed and enjoyed by a citizen of a State under the laws created by the State expressly recognized by the fundamental law of the land.

And if any doubt upon this subject had ever been entertained, I ask you to refer to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States recently made, in which every doubt is taken away:

The power of Congress—

I read from 2 Otto, page 215, the syllabus of the case—

> The power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of voting at State elections rests upon this amendment, and can be exercised by providing a punishment only when the wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at such elections is because of his color, race, or previous condition of servitude.

The highest judicial tribunal of the United States has determined that there is no power in the Congress of the United States to interfere with voting at the State elections excepting in the single instance where the power was conferred upon the General Government by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Now, on what theory, I ask you, does this legislation of which I speak rest? On what theory does the United States Government send troops to the polls at a State election? On what theory do supervisors of elections stand at the polls to supervise and interfere with State elections? Only upon this: that the right of suffrage is a right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, in the exercise of which it is the business of Congress to protect the citizen. But, as I have shown you by the express phraseology of the Constitution and by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, no such right does exist to be protected by the Constitution of the United States and by the legislation of Congress. And therefore is not the conclusion inevitable and irresistible that any legislation upon the subject is unconstitutional?

I know that gentlemen undertake to sustain the constitutionality of this legislation by referring to a provision of the Constitution, article 1, section 4:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The manifest and true construction of this provision is that in the event of the people of a State failing to make provision on these subjects Congress in the exercise of its discretion may make regulations on the subject, and that when States make regulations Congress may alter them as to "the time, places, and manner of holding elections."

The voters are fixed by section 2, which I have already read. They are the persons who can vote under the law of a State and possess the qualifications requisite as voters of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. The time of holding the election, the place of holding the election, the manner of holding the election may be provided by Congress in the cases which I have suggested, but when the time and places of holding the elections are fixed, what power remains?

Manifestly only the power of regulating the manner of holding elections is left, which involves merely the manner of voting, whether viva voce or by ballot, and in no way authorizes interference with the methods of the assertion, or the protection by the voters, of their rights. This view is abundantly shown by the debates in the constitutional convention and in the various conventions of the States which ratified the Constitution originally. The speech of Mr. Iredell upon this subject, of the State of North Carolina, is unanswerable, who said that it never was intended or designed by this provision to give the power over the elections in the States to Congress, only the regulation of the time, places, and methods of voting. It has been contended in the progress of this argument that the power over this subject may be derived from that provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to guarantee to every State a republican form of government and to send troops to suppress domestic violence on the call of the executive in the absence of the Legislature, or of the Legislature of a State.

There may be such domestic violence at the polls that the governor of the State, if the Legislature be not in session, would be bound to call upon the President of the United States for assistance, and in such cases as that the power of the Government can be properly exercised; but the ground on which the power is exercised is, that it is at the request of the authorities of the State. The troops of the United States have no business at the polls except for the suppression of violence or for repelling invasion at the request of the State authorities, the State authorities having first indicated to the General Government the desire of assistance. Is not this very clause to which I have referred an additional argument in favor of the position that this law is unconstitutional? The troops of the United States can only be used in a State to suppress domestic violence or repel foreign invasion, and at the request of the State authorities; and here is a law which proposes to send troops to the polls at any time, at the order of anybody, without any request of the State authorities; and it is certainly the plainest violation of that provision of the Constitution which directs the only way in which the troops of the United States shall be sent to a State.

The Constitution thereby prohibited any other method of sending troops to a State. I say, then, that these provisions should be repealed because they are in direct conflict with the fundamental law of the country and in the plainest violation of an expressed adjudication of the highest judicial tribunal of the land.

In the second place, these laws should be repealed because they introduce a dangerous methods and practices into the conducting of elections and the administration of justice. They authorize men to interfere with the election of the local officers of the State. In the State of Ohio, and I believe in most of the States of the Union, the law is that all officers shall be voted for on a general ticket—State officers, county officers, and members of Congress.

In the State of Ohio every man whose name is on the ballot is voted for as an officer of the State, and yet this provision of this law proposes to put United States supervisors to supervise the counting and casting of the votes for county officers and State officers. I submit that no such power was ever intended by the Constitution of the United States to be conferred upon Congress; and I submit that the State cannot be shorn of her sovereignty in this way without danger to its institutions.

Again consider section 2, article 1, to which I have referred. Who are the voters? They are the persons whose qualifications are fixed by the constitution of the State, and under this law the supervisors are stationed at the polls to superintend elections at which voters created by State constitutions and laws exercise the rights of suffrage. If the law of Congress fixed the qualifications for the electors of a State, then it might be proper that the Federal supervisors should be present to interpret and execute the laws; but under what doctrine of constitutional law, on what principle of government will you say that supervisors appointed by the Federal Government, strangers to the laws of a State, shall stand at the polls and interpret its laws and execute them?

The third objection is that these supervising officers are armed with authority unknown in the history of the common law or State laws. They have authority at the polls on the day of election to arrest, without warrant, any man whom they may suspect of being about to engage in a violation of the laws. There is no principle of common law or State law which can authorize the arrest of citizens without warrant on suspicion of an intention to commit an offense.

Here are men who honestly believe that they have the right to vote, and who on going to the polls to deposit their ballots are confronted with this extraordinary invasion of the rights of civil liberty and arrested, and, as in the city of New York, incarcerated in many instances for days. What an extraordinary scene was presented for a republican government in the city of New York at the last election! Thousands of men who had failed to get out their naturalization papers in a way that suited the judgment of the supervisor of elections were arrested upon sight. At one time over six hundred men were under arrest who had gone to the polls honestly believing that they had the right to vote. They had committed no breach of the peace; they had committed no felony. They had attempted to exercise what they believed to be their right and their duty. Yet they were incarcerated and prevented from voting. Since that time a judicial tribunal to which the case was referred has determined that these men were not guilty; that they were innocent; that they were entitled to vote at the election.

An outrage so monstrous against the right of suffrage and the performance of the duties of a freeman, I venture to say, has not within this century been perpetrated before under any government, monarchical or despotic.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment to correct a misstatement not purposely made?

Mr. HURD. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The court has never determined that these men arrested had the right to vote. The court has only determined one single point of law, and that was in the Coleman case; that the record of the court was sufficient. That decision does not apply to all the cases, because against nearly every man arrested there was cause of challenge in fact and not in law.

Mr. HURD. I may have misapprehended the exact point determined by the court. But this much I am sure of: that the persons arrested without warrant by the authority of Mr. Davenport were discharged by the judicial tribunals to which the case was referred.

Mr. McLANE. I want to say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. HURD] that he is not mistaken as to the point decided by the court. The court decided expressly that the naturalization papers were lawful and did entitle the men to vote.

Mr. FRYE. But the court decided expressly that the naturalization papers were not illegal because of no record. But against every naturalization paper there was another cause in fact besides that in law.

Mr. HURD. I have finished what I desired to say upon my second point of objection to these measures, and as a reason for their repeal; that is, that they introduce new and extraordinary methods for the control of elections and for the administration of justice.

Another point which I urge against them as a reason for their repeal, and one which so overshadowingly is greater than the others that I have been loath and hesitated to discuss them. It is that these measures in their very nature and essence are dangerous and destructive to civil liberty.

All history is full of warnings upon this subject. No republic which has ever perished from the face of the earth has gone to its grave save through military influence. The familiarization of the people through the army with the forms of despotism, the gradual abrogation of the forms of the republic, and the ultimate subversion of all civil government have marked the career of every republic from its birth to its grave, and shall we escape the force and application of the universal rule? Is power less sweet, are rights more sacred, are liberties more secure in this country, that we can dare without harm to trifle with a danger that has wrought ruin everywhere before?

From lands where republics have died and where monarchies have been erected on their ruins; from lands where the contest for liberty is now going on; from lands where the shadow of despotism darkens every household and compels the citizen to seek shelter upon some foreign shore, helpless to free himself at home, there come the solemn notes of warning against military interference.

From the presence of troops at the polls to the control of elections by troops is but a single step. In that step free elections are gone; and free elections are the source of free government and the author and originator of its power. Troops at the polls mean intimidation of voters; troops at the polls mean as its result the registration of the will of the commander; troops at the polls mean the substitution of the bayonet for the ballot, the enthronement of the Commander-in-Chief, and the deposition of the President.

I have been astounded, as this debate has continued, to hear from gentlemen upon the other side arguments in favor of the use of troops at the polls, the last place in the world where such arguments should be heard; but my regret is lost in joy when I recollect that the party of the Army is not in power in this Congress. [Applause on the democratic side.]

It is objected to these measures of legislation which we propose that there is a possibility by our passing these laws of restraining the veto power of the President; or, as my distinguished friend from Ohio put it the other day, of "interfering with his participation in the legislation." I deny that the President of the United States has any right to participate in the legislation of this country.

All legislative power is vested in the Senate and the House of Representatives. The President may, if he is satisfied with a measure of legislation, affix his signature to it. If he does not put his name to it it becomes a law at the expiration of ten days under certain circumstances. If he vetoes it, it returns to the House where it originated and is made a law, not by his act, but by the vote of forty-three of the members of the two Houses. He has nothing to do with the legislation of this country. Therefore in the decision of a question relating to legislation we must be governed by our own judgment and not by his opinion.

It has been said by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that it means "revolution" for us to pass these bills as we propose. From the beginning of the Government has not the House originated revenue bills or appropriation bills? Has not the House been competent to pass a bill repealing a law which remains upon the statute-book? The only question then is whether we have power to pass a provision for repeal as part of a law of appropriation, and that is a question of mere parliamentary practice and order to be determined by the rules of the body itself.

"Revolution" to pass an appropriation bill! "Revolution" to repeal an objectionable statute! "Revolution" to incorporate into an appropriation bill a provision repealing a statute! No, no. In the exercise of inherent constitutional power the House does all this. If there be "revolution" it is in the suggestion which has come from the gentleman from Ohio. If there be "revolution" it is in the suggestions which have come from others of the distinguished leaders of the republican party in this House. It is revolution against every theory of the Constitution, the absolute overthrow of that instrument itself, for a member of this House, be he an intimate friend of the President or not, to threaten the House with a veto by the President if we dare pass such laws as we deem proper. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the majority of this House will be intimidated from their duty by the threat of any President, [applause,] much less the threat of a President whose title to office is so doubtful.

Mr. Chairman, the sentence from the Constitution with which I commenced my remarks I regard as so important in this discussion that I shall read it again:

> All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

What does that mean? Why was it incorporated into the Constitution of the United States? Was there ever any other government that had a provision like that; and, if so, what was its history and to what uses was it applied? In English history we find that the House of Commons has power alone to originate money bills. Of what value that is let me illustrate by reading from De Lolme on the constitution of England, one of the most brilliant French commentators on that instrument:

> The right to grant subsidies to the Crown, possessed by the people of England, is the safeguard of all their other liberties, religious and civil. It is a regular means, conferred on them by the constitution, of influencing the motion of the executive, and it forms the tie by which the latter is bound to them.

It thus appears that the power of the House of Commons to originate money bills was under the English constitution a regular method of influencing the motion of the executive power. Do you suppose our fathers incorporated a corresponding provision into our Constitution without understanding the uses to which it had been applied? Its purpose in English history was to influence the motion of executive power, and it had been used on many a memorable occasion in behalf of the civil and religious liberties of the English people.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, even what will be the action of this House upon this bill. I certainly do not know what will be the action of the President of the United States when the bill is submitted to him, if it shall pass; much less can I know what will be the action of the House when the bill may be returned to us with his objections. But this much I do know, that if the power of withholding supplies shall be exercised, then never in all the contests for liberty in English history, never in all the victories which have made that little stormy island the center of civilization of the world, never in all the struggles for the rights of man between the Commons and the Crown, was the power of holding supplies exercised more wisely than it will be when we exercise it to preserve the freedom of elections, to subordinate in times of peace the military power to the civil authority, and to preserve pure and uncontaminated the sources of free government. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, obtained the floor and said: Mr. Chairman, it being now so near the usual hour of adjournment, I would very much like, if it be the pleasure of the committee, to move that the committee rise, so that I may be allowed to go on in the morning. If there is no objection, I make that motion.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will proceed with his remarks this evening.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] will bear me witness that I have not very often trespassed upon the time of the House or of the Committee of the Whole; and I very much desire to have the opportunity to go on in the morning if gentlemen will consent.

Mr. SPARKS. I would suggest to the gentleman to let some other member on that side take his place this evening—to change places with some other member.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] so desires, I will cheerfully yield twenty minutes to him at this time, with the understanding that the motion be then made that the committee rise, and that I shall have the floor in the morning.

Mr. McMAHON. I would like to know when we expect to have a vote on this bill. I only make the inquiry for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised upon that point. No order has been made by the House for closing the general debate on the bill.

Mr. SPARKS. I certainly cannot make any arrangement that the committee shall rise after a twenty-minute speech. My idea was that we ought to have a night session for debate only. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Does not that suggestion meet with favor? Then let the debate progress now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized as entitled to twenty minutes of the hour of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly satisfied that this debate shall take a very wide range; but we ought to have some general understanding that it is to conclude some time. I had thought that a session to-night would allow a great many gentlemen who want to make remarks on this subject an opportunity to make them, while others should speak to-morrow or if necessary we could have another day's discussion. We have already occupied four days in this debate. Some time ought to be fixed for bringing it to a close. If we go on adjourning at four o'clock day after day, occupying only two or three hours daily, the discussion may be limitless.

Mr. WHITE. It is half past four o'clock now.

Mr. SPARKS. Only twenty minutes after four; and we have been delayed by this proposition that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that all questions in reference to closing general debate must be decided in the House, and cannot be decided in committee.

Mr. SPARKS. Of course; I understand that.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I was about to suggest that the twenty minutes occupied by the gentleman from Kansas will bring us near the hour of five o'clock; and I will occupy my forty minutes in the morning.

Mr. HASKELL. I also prefer to say to-morrow what I have to say.

Mr. McMAHON. I want to know whether it is likely we shall have a vote to-morrow or next day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair cannot answer that question.

Mr. GARFIELD. That cannot be determined till we get into the House.

Mr. HASKELL. The gentleman from Wisconsin has yielded the floor to me for twenty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Of course I have yielded with the distinct understanding that I shall be entitled to the floor for the remaining forty minutes in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will protect the gentleman's rights.

Mr. HASKELL. With the consent of the gentleman from Wisconsin, I make the motion that the committee now rise, in order that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin, as well as that which he has kindly conceded to me, may be reserved to be occupied in the morning.

The motion that the committee rise was not agreed to; there being—ayes 93, noes 109.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope I shall not detain the committee longer than the time that has been yielded to me. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debates on this question upon both sides of the House. I have been carried back by the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] to the origin of the war, to the legislation of the republican party, and have listened to the harsh and hostile criticisms that have been made upon its course during the eighteen years of its supremacy. I have listened with much interest to the remarks that have been made by my friends upon the republican side, wherein they have defended the record of their party, wherein they have asserted that in their present position upon this question they have no desire save to preserve the peace at the polls and the purity of the ballot-box.

In view of the fact that on both sides of this House reminiscences have been indulged in, and in view also of the fact that these very words sought to be stricken out of a statute of the United States were placed there upon the motion of a Senator from the State of Kansas, I believe that it becomes my duty as a Representative of that State, and also as a republican member upon this floor, to give what may have seemed to that Senator, and what seems to the Representatives of that State now on this floor, some reasons for desiring that a strong Federal power may be exercised in time of need to preserve the purity of the ballot-box. I desire, then, to call the attention of this committee briefly to a record which I hold in my hand concerning one of the elections held in the Territory of Kansas.

Gentlemen here will recollect that the real beginning of the late struggle between the North and the South was not, as it has been stated on the republican side of the House, by the firing of that fateful gun at Sumter; nor was the war begun, as has been stated on the other side, amid the rattle of John Brown's musketry at Harper's Ferry. No, Mr. Chairman, that war began here in Congress and upon this floor when the Kansas and Nebraska bill was introduced and the compromise measures of 1820 were repealed, which forbade the introduction of slavery into the territory purchased from France, known as the Louisiana Territory. When the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska were sought to be opened up to the slave power there arose a struggle between the North and the South, between the pro-slavery forces and the free State forces at the ballot-box, as to who should control the future destiny of the State of Kansas. I hold in my hand an extract from the report of a congressional committee on that subject—a record of the first important election held in the Territory of Kansas, March 30, 1855. I ask that it be read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the same day that the census was completed the governor issued his proclamation for an election to be held on the 30th of March, A. D. 1855, for members of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory. It prescribed the boundaries of districts, the places for polls, the names of judges, the apportionment of members, and recited the qualification of voters. If it had been observed a just and fair election would have reflected the will of the people of the Territory. Before the election false and inflammatory rumors were busily circulated among the people of Western Missouri. The number and character of the emigration then passing into the Territory were grossly exaggerated and misrepresented. Through the active exertions of many of its leading citizens, aided by the secret society before referred to, the passions and prejudices of the people of that State were greatly excited. Several residents there have testified to the character of the reports circulated among and credited by the people. These efforts were successful. By an organized movement, which extended from Andrew County in the north to Jasper County in the south and as far eastward as Boone and Cole Counties, Missouri, companies of men were arranged in irregular parties and sent into every council district in the Territory, and into every representative district but one. The members were so distributed as to control the election in each district. They went to vote, and with the avowed design to make Kansas a slave State. They were generally armed and equipped, carried with them their own provisions and tents, and so marched into the Territory. The details of this invasion form the mass of the testimony taken by your committee, and is so voluminous that we can here state but the leading facts elicited.

First district—Lawrence.—The company of persons who marched into this district was collected in Ray, Howard, Carroll, Boone, La Fayette, Randolph, Macon, Clay, Jackson, Saline, and Cass Counties, in the State of Missouri. Their expenses were paid; those who could not come, contributing provisions, wagons, &c. Provisions were deposited for those who were expected to come to Lawrence in the house of William Lykins, and were distributed among the Missourians after they arrived there. The evening before and the morning of the day of election about one thousand men from the above counties arrived at Lawrence and camped in a ravine a short distance from town, near the place of voting. They came in wagons (of which there were over one hundred) and on horseback, under the command of Colonel Samuel Young, of Boone County, Missouri, and Claiborne F. Jackson, of Missouri. They were armed with guns, rifles, pistols, and bowie-knives and had tents, music, and flags with them. They brought with them two pieces of artillery loaded with musket-balls. On their way to Lawrence some of them met Mr. N. B. Blanton, who had been appointed one of the judges of election by Governor Reeder, and, after learning from him that he considered it his duty to demand an oath from them as to their place of residence, first attempted to bribe him and then threatened him with hanging in order to induce him to dispense with that oath. In consequence of these threats he did not appear at the polls the next morning to act as judge.

The evening before the election, while in camp, the Missourians were called together at the tent of Captain Claiborne F. Jackson, and speeches were made to them by Colonel Young and others, calling for volunteers to go to other districts where there were not Missourians enough to control the election, as there were more at Lawrence than were needed there. Many volunteered to go, and on the morning of the election several companies, from one hundred and fifty to two hundred each, went off to Tecumseh, Hickory Point, Bloomington, and other places. On the morning of the election the Missourians came over to the place of voting from their camp in bodies of one hundred at a time. Mr. Blanton not appearing, another judge was appointed in his place; Colonel Young claiming that, as the people of the Territory had two judges, it was nothing more than right that the Missourians should have the other one to look after their interests; and Robert A. Cummins was elected in Blanton's stead because he considered that every man had a right to vote if he had been in the Territory but an hour.

The Missourians brought their tickets with them, but not having enough they had three hundred more printed in Lawrence on the evening before and on the day of election. They had white ribbons in their buttonholes to distinguish themselves from the settlers.

Mr. HASKELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, March 28, 1855, was the first day I ever saw within the Territory of Kansas. I came up from Kansas City, Missouri, to the town of Lawrence, in company with these one thousand men whom I saw afterward at the polls in that town casting their ballots for the election of the Legislature of that Territory. I can vouch for the truth of the foregoing statement.

I desire also to send to the Clerk's desk, to show what was the result of that election, two sections of the old statutes of the Territory of Kansas that were afterward enacted by that Legislature, enactments made possible in consequence of elections carried in that way by mobs and armed forces, accompanied by artillery.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Were there not two reports, and was it not the majority report which the gentleman had read?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. You are having that read as true history?

Mr. HASKELL. I was there and know myself the accuracy of what I state. I ask the Clerk to read the sections to which I have referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. If any free person, by speaking or by writing, assert or maintain that persons have not the right to hold slaves in this Territory, or shall introduce into this Territory, print, publish, write, circulate, or cause to be introduced into this Territory written, printed, published, or circulated in this Territory any book, paper, magazine, pamphlet, or circular containing any denial of the right of persons to hold slaves in this Territory, such person shall be deemed guilty of felony, and punished by imprisonment at hard labor for a term of not less than two years.

SEC. 13. No person who is conscientiously opposed to holding slaves, or who does not admit the right to hold slaves in this Territory, shall sit as a juror on the trial of any prosecution for any violation of any of the sections of this act.

Mr. HASKELL. Those are two enactments of the Legislature elected by such means as have been shown in the report read at the Clerk's desk.

I desire also to have printed with my remarks the charge of the United States judge of that district, Judge Le Compte, wherein he charged the jury that if any person shall resist in any way the enforcement of these laws he shall be indicted for the crime of high treason.

On the 5th of May Judge Le Compte delivered a charge, highly partisan in its character, to the grand jury of Douglas County, of which the following extract is his own words:

This Territory was organized by an act of Congress, and so far its authority is from the United States. It has a Legislature elected in pursuance of that organic act. This Legislature, being an instrument of Congress, by which it governs the Territory, has passed laws; these laws, therefore, are of United States authority and making, and all that resist these laws, resist the power and authority of the United States, and are, therefore, guilty of high treason. Now, gentlemen, if you find that any persons have resisted these laws, then must you, under your oath, find bills against such persons for high treason. If you find that no such resistance has been made, but that combinations have been formed for the purpose of resisting them, and individuals of influence and notoriety have been aiding and abetting in such combinations, then must you still find bills for constructive treason; the blow need not be struck, but only the intention may be evident.

It was because of these laws, thus construed and thus sought to be executed, that the territorial war of 1855-'56 in Kansas was inaugurated and carried on.

I ask now the special attention of my democratic friends on the other side of the House. It was in these acts that you dug or your representatives dug that pit from which you have never been extricated. It was because of the issues that you forced upon the people of the North, and through elections carried in this way, and by laws thus enacted and executed, that you dug the political grave of the democratic party. You sought to extend the area of slave territory and strove for greater power, but in your injustice and frauds you not only failed in that direction, but you prepared the way for the dethronement of the democracy that had held power for so long in this Union, and planted the germs of the great civil war so soon to follow. It was upon the plains of Kansas that the first gun of the rebellion was fired. Had you permitted (what we ask now) free and fair elections, the history of our country, as it is now recorded, would never have been written.

I desire to call the attention of this House to the fact that in nearly all the Southern States it is claimed, upon a perfectly good authority, the report after report of investigating committees, that there is a denial of the right of a free and fair ballot there. It is claimed also that in the city of New York the freedom of election has been interfered with. And as Representatives upon this floor, especially as Representatives of a State where we have seen worked out the iniquity that comes from a ballot-box not duly protected, we of Kansas, at least, stand here boldly and fairly and squarely in the defense of Federal election laws wide enough, strong enough, and far-reaching enough to preserve the rights of every citizen of every State and every Territory in the discharge of his duty at the polls, governed only by his own conscience and his love of country.

You say that you have peaceful elections in the South now; that you have fair elections in New York City, or could have them without these laws. It was also claimed by your representative men that the same was true in my State. Here is a memorandum in the life of one of your representative men, my venerable friend from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] then as now a member of this House. He claimed then on this floor, in all honesty and candor I believe, what you claim now, that there was no trouble in Kansas. He writes in his private memorandum that which I read, contained in the history of his life, under the date of June 14, 1856:

JUNE 14.—We have some news here. Stringfellow has got to the city direct from Kansas. I have not seen him myself, but Toombs, who left me just now, saw him last night. Stringfellow is our main man in Kansas, you know. According to Toombs's report, all things are now comparatively quiet there. The newspaper reports of burnings and civil war are unfounded, and got up by northern agitators for effect. The hotel at Lawrence was presented by the grand jury as a nuisance, and ordered to be demolished as such. He says the investigations of the committee will work in our favor greatly when published. The committee will be here this week. He says they want no more men in Kansas; they want no fighting; that all is working just as it ought. His account, in a few words, is better than I expected.

It was yet just one month before our venerable friend, honestly and in sincerity, I presume, penned those lines—just one month before—that an armed force of six hundred men destroyed not only a hotel in my town, but a printing-press and private residences, rifled the houses of the inhabitants, and carried away their property. The hotel was sought to be destroyed at first by cannonading, and the gun that was pointed at it was aimed by an ex-Vice-President of the United States, David R. Atchison. The following is from the report of the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives on "Kansas claims:"

In the mean time the remainder of the force, comprising several hundred men, with United States muskets and fixed bayonets, were taking position in the town. Men endeavored by argument, and women by tears, to alter the determination of Jones, but in vain. At three and a quarter o'clock he announced to Messrs. Eldridge that he would give them till five to remove their families and furniture from the house. The work of pillage had already commenced; the contents of the printing-offices were scattered in the streets, and the red flag planted on the roof, first of the office of the Herald of Freedom and afterward of the Eldridge House. The family of Mr. G. W. Brown were driven from their house, and the immediate pillage of the hotel prevented only by the resolute interference of a few citizens, aided by some individuals of the mob, who kept a strict guard at the doors and insisted the families of the proprietors should have the time promised by Jones in which to collect their most necessary effects and leave. At last the cannon were placed and ready, and it was announced to Colonel S. W. Eldridge that the bombardment would commence in five minutes. His wife and children and such personal effects as they had been enabled to collect were placed in carriages and driven off between files of United States bayonets and amid the yells of the impatient mob. As they left the town the first boom of a cannon told that the work of destruction had begun. Soon (as the impression made by the cannon was not great) the building was fired and with the aid of gunpowder reduced, with its furniture and stores, to a pile of ruins.

The work of pillage spread through the whole town, and continued until after dark. Every house and store which could be entered was ransacked, trunks broken open, and money and property taken at will. Where women had not fled they were in some cases insulted, and even robbed of their clothing. From one house over $2,000 in money were carried away. The house of Charles Robinson was pillaged and burned to the ground. The same evening the forces were drawn off to their camp, and the sack of Lawrence was concluded.

Some incidents of this authorized outrage here demand mention. While Messrs. Topliff and Perry were aiding the marshal in making the arrests both their houses were broken open and pillaged. Some of the flags which floated beside that of the Union had for mottoes, "Superiority of the white race;" "Kansas the outpost;" "South Carolina;" while one had the national stripes, with a tiger in place of the Union; another had alternated stripes of black and white. While the cannon were being placed for the destruction of the Eldridge House, David R. Atchison, late Vice-President of the United States, was conspicuous among the mob. When the final doom of the hotel and the printing offices was pronounced, it was said by the officials to be by order of the Government, as the grand jury of Douglas County had ordered them abated as nuisances. The only charge against the Eldridge House was its ownership by the Emigrant Aid Company.

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman from Kansas permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPEER. As the gentleman is speaking on the subject of Kansas and its former troubles, let me ask him if he is aware of the fact that the present Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. John Sherman, moved an amendment to the Army appropriation bill in the year 1856 to this effect:

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend by inserting the following:

Provided, nevertheless, That no part of the military force of the United States herein provided for shall be employed in aid of the enforcement of the enactments of the alleged Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas, recently assembled at Shawnee Mission, until Congress shall have enacted either that it was or was not a valid Legislative Assembly, chosen in conformity with the organic law by the people of the said Territory: And provided, That, until Congress shall have passed on the validity of the said Legislative Assembly of Kansas, it shall be the duty of the President to use the military force in said Territory to preserve the peace, suppress insurrection, repel invasion, and protect persons and property therein and upon the national highways in the State of Missouri from unlawful seizures and searches: And be it further provided, That the President is required to disarm the present organized militia of the Territory of Kansas, and recall all the United States arms therein distributed, and to prevent armed men from going into said Territory to disturb the public peace or aid in the enforcement or resistance of real or pretended laws.

Was that revolutionary?

Mr. HASKELL. We thanked John Sherman for that report then, and I thank him for it now.

The men came from Missouri and other States into the Territory who elected the Legislature referred to by Mr. Sherman's proposed amendment.

Mr. SPEER. Is not John Sherman good republican authority?

Mr. HASKELL. Absolutely so, so far as John Sherman goes; but I apprehend that John Sherman simply represents himself in this matter. I am speaking now from the stand-point of a republican Representative from my State, and it makes no more difference to me what John Sherman said than it does that these laws were voted for by democrats.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask the gentleman a further question, if he will permit me.

Mr. HASKELL. I cannot yield further at this time.

Gentlemen may say that this was simply a local feud; that it was simply a feud that grew up between Kansas and the bordering State of Missouri. That is not true. Armed bodies of men were sent from Missouri, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, and other States of the South. Organized companies of militia were sent into Kansas, not for the purpose of protecting the pro-slavery men in voting, for they were never denied that privilege, but of voting themselves at our elections.

I tell gentlemen on the other side of the House that in view of the history of that State you cannot find a man, woman, or child who recollects the early incidents connected with the government of that Territory but who desires to-day that the strongest possible power may be exerted for the protection of citizens of the United States at the ballot-box, be they white or black, at the North or at the South.

Gentlemen claim here that in the State of New York it would be entirely possible without supervisors to have a fair election, and that the laws of the State are sufficient for the protection of individual citizens in their right to vote. It may be true. The gentleman on this side of the House [Mr. FRYE] called your attention to the fact that, in his opinion, the laws of that State are not sufficient to protect the ballot-box in New York City, and have never been found so as a matter of fact. He also related an incident of the war to show you what their power was at that time for protecting the citizens of that State at the ballot-box. He told you how colored men were hunted through the streets of New York by a mob and hung at the lamp-posts. Let me finish the sketch, and tell you how this mob, fired with rage and excitement, burned an orphan asylum in the city of New York, and scattered the little waifs, houseless and homeless, on the cold charity of the streets of the city; and later still, when they had collected before one of the great business palaces of that city, a trim and tidy and an aristocratic figure from the portico addressed that seething, boiling mass of brutal humanity as "my friends." Who was it? Horatio Seymour, the democratic governor of the State of New York.

If there was not a sufficient power or willingness on the part of the executive of the State to suppress a draft riot, have we any warrant that he could or would suppress a ballot-box-stuffing riot at the polls, should one occur?

How was it later, when the draft had to be taken for the purpose of supplying the quota of the State. A road had to be cut through this same mob in order that the officers might prosecute their work and the armies of the United States be filled. If these things were true in New York City itself in such cause and under such circumstances, is it not fairly possible that, if all the laws for the protection of the ballot-box were cut from the United States statutes, all the frauds that have disgraced the nation, and that gave thirty, forty, or fifty thousand illegal votes in that city, may be re-enacted any day as they were under the régime of Tweed?

You claim further the repeal of the test oath for the grand and petit juries in the Southern States. Let it be repealed if it is wise to do so. It was put there that you of the South should deal fairly with northern men and the negro who was charged with crime. Is it an unheard-of thing? I have just read to you a more monstrous statute.

I have caused to be read a clause from an old statute of Kansas, placed there by a democratic Legislature in the full flush of democratic pride and prosperity, which provides that any man conscientiously opposed to the institution of slavery shall not serve on a jury for the trial of any crime under the statute concerning slavery.

A man was not allowed to vote unless he swore to support the fugitive slave law and kindred enactments.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is speaking in the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the portion allotted to him has expired.

Mr. McCOOK. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended. The time was extended on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent the gentleman can speak in his own time.

Mr. SPARKS. How long does the gentleman desire to speak?

Mr. HASKELL. But a very short time; not longer than five or ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Then, if there be no objection, the gentleman will be allowed five minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. HASKELL. The question before us at this time is, not what was generally talked of in this House during the Forty-fifth Congress, the repeal of the statute leveled against an Army officer who should misuse his power at the polls, but it is far more than the repeal of the statute placed on the statute-book in 1865. I speak for myself only when I say that I would be willing to repeal that law if the question came in a proper way. It would leave the operation of all other laws, it leaves the operation of the Federal election laws entirely free.

But you have not brought before this House the simple repeal of that obnoxious section. You come in here with a provision that the old section shall be re-enacted, save and except the words "or keep the peace at the polls." When you cut those words out of the old section and re-enact it again, you are spreading upon the statute-books what is virtually a new law. You are enacting a law that civil officers of this Government under no circumstances shall appear at the polls armed for the enforcement of the law.

Now, I would care very little for the wiping out of the old statute; but when you come to re-enact, as you propose in this bill before us, that old statute with the words left out to which I have referred, you might as well repeal at once the entire Federal election laws. With that old statute so re-enacted all the other laws are inoperative and void.

You wonder why we make a stand here to-day and in the beginning of this Congress upon this bill. Why, sir, if this bill passes, then the sections which you propose to repeal by provisions in the legislative appropriation bill may remain on your statute-books or be taken off; they will effect nothing. With this law as you present it here, the Federal election laws are a nullity, are void and worthless. That, I presume, is the reason that the republican party of this House has taken the ground at the beginning of this struggle that not one step by their consent shall be taken toward stripping the statute-book of these Federal election laws, which we believe are absolutely essential to the protection and the purity of the ballot-box. Upon that issue, then, we are entirely willing to go to the country. Upon that issue we join forces with you. If, under the Constitution and lawfully, you shall pass that provision here, if lawfully it shall be passed in the Senate of the United States, and if the President of the United States sees fit to approve it, it will become the law of the land against which we shall have uttered only a protest.

But we do insist and we shall insist that that power which has always been allowed to the Executive to approve or disapprove a bill of Congress just as he sees fit, shall continue to be left with him; that he shall have the privilege of approving or disapproving any bill just as it meets his judgment or not.

Gentlemen upon the other side have said that the republican party to-day takes the position wrongfully that the President has the same right to exercise his power of approval or disapproval as this Congress. Sir, it is a right that cannot be taken from him. It is as much his privilege to approve a bill as it is to disapprove it, and as much his privilege to disapprove it as to approve it.

What would be said by our democratic friends if the President should take the position occupied by the democratic side of the House? Suppose you were to send a bill to the White House that the President is entirely willing to approve. Suppose also that there was pending before you another bill which in his judgment ought not to pass; and suppose that he intimated that if you did pass that other bill which met his disapproval he would pocket the bill which he did not object to; you would impeach him or begin the work of impeaching him within twenty-four hours.

Yet, from the declarations of leading men on your side of the House, that is the precise position which you occupy to-day. You say you have not a two-third vote in this House; that you cannot pass this measure unless you force it through on an appropriation bill, and that you will compel the President, whether he likes it or not, to accept it or stop the wheels of the Government.

In the Constitution, as commented upon by all the learned men of the days that are gone, it is as expressly provided that the President shall exercise that power freely without force as that this body may exercise its power; and that when it was exercised according to his judgment, two-thirds of both Houses of Congress must be found to be in accord with the measure which he disapproved, or it must fall to the ground.

You, then, upon that side of the House are taking a position which if taken by the Executive at the other end of the Avenue would lead to his impeachment. Your position which you take upon this bill ought to lead, by all the laws which control justice, truth, and right, to your impeachment before the bar of public opinion of this country. To that tribunal we shall appeal if you succeed here, and await the decision of the whole people of the United States in perfect confidence.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, in relation to the joint rules between the two Houses, was presented by Mr. BURCH, the Secretary of the Senate, who also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the purchase or construction of a refrigerating ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes, and for other purposes.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

COLUMBIA INSTITUTION FOR DEAF AND DUMB.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I have had the honor to receive from the Secretary a notice, under date of the 26th of March, that the Vice-President had "appointed Mr. EDMUNDS a director of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb to fill the vacancy in the board of directors of said institution occasioned by the expiration of the term of his former appointment." I beg leave, thanking the Chair for the honor he has done me, to decline accepting the appointment. I have served I think for six years as the director appointed by the President of the Senate in that place, and I think I have had my share of the honor and certainly of the responsibility and labor. Therefore I trust that the Chair will receive my declining the acceptance with thanks, and appoint some other Senator in my place.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WHYTE, it was Ordered, That the petition of the messengers of the Supreme Court of the United States and the papers in support of the same be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of the heirs of Charles B. Smith be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further business for the morning hour? If not the Secretary will report the Calendar of resolutions and concurrent resolutions in their order.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 21st of March:

Resolved, That the refusal by one House of Congress to make necessary provision for the support of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments, and for the defense of the country, except upon condition that the other House and the President shall give their assent to legislation which they disapprove, and the refusal by Congress to make such provision except upon condition that the President shall give such assent, are unconstitutional, revolutionary, and if persisted in must lead to the overthrow of constitutional government and the destruction of the national life.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the resolution? Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. WHYTE. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) I shall have to ask my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] for I do not know, if this is a political question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose it is.

Mr. EATON. Then I shall decline to vote, as I am paired with my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] on political questions. I should vote "yea" if I had a right to vote.

Mr. SAUNDERS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] on this question. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM, (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is detained at home by sickness. He is paired with the Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. SAUNDERS.]

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 35, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Bailey,	Gordon,	Lamar,	Thurman,

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLAINE. I suppose that concludes the matter for the day, so far as that resolution is concerned?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. BLAINE. This side of the Chamber has desired to have a direct vote on the resolution, and I give notice that I shall to-morrow and as often as may seem expedient thereafter, move to take the resolution from the table, not with any intention of prolonging debate upon it, if that be unpleasant, but with the intention simply of asking that Senators may give a direct yea or nay vote upon the proposition contained in it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator whether the resolution has ever been referred to a committee?

Mr. BLAINE. Has it just occurred to the honorable Senator from West Virginia, ten days after the resolution has been before the Senate, that it should be referred?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It occurred to me ten days ago.

Mr. BLAINE. You have never given this side of the Chamber even an opportunity to refer it; but I am quite amazed that the Senator wakes up this morning to the propriety of what if it had been suggested at all should have been suggested ten days ago.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator need not be surprised. We do not take suggestions on this side of the Chamber from the other side.

Mr. BLAINE. Well, I need not be; I should not be surprised at anything nowadays.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator says he has not had an opportunity to refer the resolution. There is an opportunity now to refer it if he wishes to do so.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not say that I desired the resolution to be referred, for I should expect if it was referred that would be the last we should ever hear of it; it would be sat upon in committee, and I do not propose to assist in strangling it to death in that way.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is not before the Senate.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

Mr. KERNAN. I merely wish to say that I do not believe it would be very profitable to have debate on this resolution before we get legislative measures before us.

Mr. BLAINE. Then we could debate the measure itself. Why should we debate such a resolution after the measure is before us?

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me. I have not thought it proper to debate these theoretical questions until practical measures came before us. I am quite willing the other side should debate if they desired to do so. That is frankly my answer. I think it is better for the country and for us to wait until the measures we propose to act upon come before us. I am not in favor of acting on general legislation at this session, but I am in favor of acting with reference to the particular subject when the questions come before us; and then every one will act upon them according to his judgment. Then the question as to the proposed legislation will be practically before us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from New York was as willing that we should vote on this side as debate, we might have disposed of the resolution one way or the other long ago. But that has gone from the Senate, I believe, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is not now before the Senate.

SENATOR FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me first to make a report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the credentials of Charles H. Bell, claiming to be appointed a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, have instructed me to make a report, which is signed by all the members of the committee concurring in the conclusions of the report, except the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] who is not in the Chamber, and I therefore ask that before the report is sent to the Printer he may have the opportunity of appending his name to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be retained for that purpose.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I ask that it be printed, and I desire to give notice that on Monday next I shall call up the resolution accompanying the report for consideration.

The resolution reported is as follows:

Resolved, That Hon. Charles H. Bell is not entitled to a seat as a Senator by virtue of the appointment by the executive of New Hampshire.

Mr. HOAR. I am authorized by a minority of the same committee to present their views in the form of a minority report. The minority report is signed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON] and myself, and is to be signed by the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] I ask leave of the Senate to retain the paper until the signature of the Senator from Kansas is attached when he comes in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To which the Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HOAR. I will then hand it to the Secretary.

Mr. RANSOM. When the vote was just taken in the Senate a moment ago I announced that my colleague [Mr. VANCE] was detained at his rooms to-day by sickness.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to appeal to the Senator from Delaware in regard to this election case. I understand that he has given notice that he will call this case up on Monday next.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROLLINS. We are very desirous that the case should be considered at an early day. We were assured, when the credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that such should be the case. I desire now to ask the Senator if it will not be convenient to him to call up the case to-morrow morning? By that time I have no doubt the reports will be printed; they can be read at the desk; and then, if it is necessary that further time should be allowed, the matter may be postponed. I understand that my friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] will not be present on Monday next, and we are certainly very desirous that the case should be taken up when he is here as he has made the minority report upon the question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that it would be utterly impossible to give an intelligent consideration to this subject to-morrow by Senators who have not personally examined the question. The report of the committee and the views of the minority will not be printed before to-morrow, and perhaps they will not be on our desks before Friday morning. Those reports ought to be examined. Senators will desire to examine those reports and investigate the principles which are involved in the reports before they enter upon the discussion or before they are required to vote upon the question. I think that Monday is the first day that we can with any degree of propriety fix for the consideration of the case.

I should be very glad to accommodate the Senator from New Hampshire or any other Senator on that side of the Chamber, but I am sure they desire that this question, when it shall be settled, shall be settled in accordance with correct principles. Therefore the members of the Senate ought to have time to enable them, if they have not already done so, to examine carefully for themselves the principles involved in this report and the views of the minority.

I desire to add that there has been no unnecessary delay in this case. The committee was called together at the earliest possible moment, and the contestant for the seat was heard in reference to his right; and the committee has from time to time met once or twice to pass upon the question. After the committee had come to a conclusion, it so happened that I was required, or found it convenient, to go to my home in Delaware, and I did not return until Monday last, and the report has been prepared since that time. Certainly there has been no unnecessary delay in this matter. We have desired to accommodate the contestant in this case and the gentlemen on the other side in general, and I do not think they can charge us with having unnecessarily delayed this case.

Mr. ROLLINS. I have no desire to press the matter unreasonably, nor do I wish to press it against the views of the chairman of the committee. I desire that the committee shall have ample time for consideration; but the Senator must bear in mind that this question has been before the Senate from the first day of the session until the present time. I can see no objection to taking the matter up in the morning. Such a course will not prevent Senators from an examination of the case. It will not prevent them having time to examine the questions involved. It perhaps will facilitate the examination to have the attention of Senators called to this matter in the morning with the printed reports on the table, for I think we should be more likely, if we take up the matter to-morrow, to examine it and to act upon it intelligently than if we postpone it until Monday next before any attention is called to it in the Senate. But, still, if the Senator from Delaware insists upon the postponement, I do not desire to press any opposition to it.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Delaware and his associates of the majority of the committee. I quite agree with that Senator that there has been no improper or unnecessary delay. On the contrary, the Committee on Privileges and Elections have dealt with the question with great promptness; and I am quite sure of the absolute sincerity of the statement of the chairman of his continued desire to deal with it promptly. I suppose if these reports go to the Printer at any time before the adjournment to-day they will be on the tables of Senators in print before we meet to-morrow at twelve o'clock. The first thing when this case comes up will be to read those reports to the Senate, if the usual course is pursued, as I understand it. I would suggest to the Senator from Delaware whether the case might not be taken up to-morrow and the reports read, and if any Senator then is prepared to address the Senate on the subject allow him to do so; and after that let the case go over until Monday.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As I understand the Senator is going to leave the city, I would agree, if he desires to express his views before he goes away, to an understanding that after he makes his speech the case shall go over until Monday.

Mr. HOAR. Let the understanding be that it may go over, unless some Senator desires to speak after the reports are read.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Unless some other Senator desires to speak then.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will permit me to add that I do not think I shall desire to address the Senate orally to-morrow.

REPORTERS ON THE FLOOR.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules is instructed to inquire and report whether it is expedient to enlarge the standing orders of the Senate so as to admit the reporters of the National Associated Press to a seat on the floor of the Senate, and also whether it is expedient to make any alteration in the standing orders adopted in the Forty-third Congress in relation to the allowance of seats on the floor of the Senate to the Associated Press reporters.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to say before the resolution is referred that complaint has been made here by the National Associated Press that they do not receive equal privileges on this floor with the New York Associated Press. I think the subject ought to go to the Committee on Rules for consideration before the Senate takes action on it, and I therefore ask the adoption of the resolution so that the subject may be before the committee.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. WALLACE, it was Ordered, That Mr. GORDON be appointed to fill the vacancies upon the standing Committees on Commerce, Agriculture, Education, and Labor, and the select committee to examine the several branches of the civil service, in the order in which such vacancies at present exist.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. THURMAN. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at one o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 2, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THREATENED INVASION OF INDIANS.

Mr. KING. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution requesting information of the President with regard to the threatened invasion by Indians under Sitting Bull.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform this House what military preparations, if any, have been made to meet the threatened invasion by Indians under Sitting Bull, from British America.

Mr. KING. It is notorious that our northern territory is threatened with invasion by Sitting Bull from British America. This Indian and his followers, during the winter of 1876-'77, suffered defeat by the United States forces under General Miles in a winter campaign of extraordinary rigor, in which frequently the troops had to endure extreme cold, the thermometer at times being forty degrees below zero in the wilds through which they marched. The Indians, starved, without forage for their horses or ammunition for their rifles, declined all overtures by this Government to place them on the footing of other Indians in our Territories, and to the number of upwards of seven thousand, we are informed, marched across the line into the dominions of Great Britain. There they have been permitted to settle in the wood-mountain immediately on our northern border.

According to international law, a belligerent or hostile party taking protection in foreign territory is compelled to lay down arms and be removed from the border to a sufficient distance to insure the prevention of further hostilities. In this case, however, such precaution has been neglected or avoided, and Sitting Bull, with a following of between two and three thousand warriors, after waging a war during which fell the brave Custer and his soldiers, which cost this Government over two millions of money and took the lives of many citizens as well as brave men and officers, has been permitted by the British authorities to occupy a menacing position on our northern boundary. There, by British authority and at English trade-posts, he has been permitted to supply himself and his followers with all of his requirements, including munitions of war.

This hostile camp now threatens the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad and our citizens and all of their interests in the fertile valley of the Yellowstone. It is a grave question whether Her Majesty's government, having taken these Indians under its protection, is not responsible for their deeds to an extent that will give the citizens on our frontier security from their ravages; else the United States Government will be compelled to keep a standing army at great cost perpetually in front of them to prevent invasion. The latter is the course to which we must urge this Government, and to take full measures in that direction that we have no more Custer massacres.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CONGER. I think that might wait till to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

YELLOW FEVER.

Mr. GOODE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time a Senate bill authorizing the construction or purchase of a refrigerator ship to prevent the introduction of yellow fever. It is the bill (S. No. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the purchase or construction of a refrigerator ship for the disinfection of vessels and cargoes, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

Mr. GOODE. The Senate made a mistake. They ought to have passed a bill to patent the gentleman from Michigan as a refrigerating objector.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman comes forward to ask unanimous consent, and is insulting in his remarks because a gentleman thinks it his duty to object, I desire the House to know it.

Mr. GOODE. I had no intention to insult the gentleman.

Mr. CONGER. I care nothing for these vulgar sneers at me as an objector, coming from the source they do. When a gentleman gets the floor to ask unanimous consent, and another member in the discharge of what he conceives to be his duty objects, I think the gentleman who objects should not be sneered at by any man.

Mr. SPARKS. I believe there is nothing before the House.

Mr. GOODE. I deem it due to myself as well as to the gentleman from Michigan to say that I intended no personal offense to him, as I supposed he would have understood.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPARKS. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, in order to resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill. But prior to that I desire to make a suggestion in regard to the limitation of time for debate. Every gentleman who has charge of a bill that runs day after day knows something of the constant requests made to him by other gentlemen, some saying, "Let us close this," and others, "Let the debate continue." Now I would like the House to determine that. This debate has already been running four or five days.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is competent for the House at any time to close the debate.

Mr. SPARKS. Well, I would like to test the sense of the House now as to the length of time we should continue this debate; and if the time is fixed perhaps it might be well then to determine the length of speeches to be made. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] is on the floor, entitled to forty minutes. Of course we could not change that; nobody would propose to do so. But will the House now fix some limit to the length of speeches—say ten minutes?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I think we had better first fix the time at which the general debate shall close, and then let the House determine as to the length of speeches. I do not think it is well to combine the two propositions together. Let the House say when the debate shall close and regulate the other matter afterward.

Mr. ATKINS. I would suggest that if the House desires to continue this discussion the shortest way is not to obstruct it. But I concur with the gentleman from Illinois in thinking that the House should this morning indicate in some way its sense as to how long the debate should extend. If it is the disposition of the House to continue the debate for some time longer, the best way is to let it run.

Mr. SPARKS. To get at the sense of the House, I move that all debate be closed to-morrow at two o'clock.

Mr. CONGER. Before that motion is put I desire to make a remark. I saw yesterday upon the list in the hands of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole the names of, I think, twenty-three or twenty-four gentlemen, and I do not know but the number may now be greater, who had expressed their desire to speak upon this subject and had not spoken upon it. Many have personally said to me that they wish to speak, and desire not to be limited except by the hour rule. I apprised the gentleman from Illinois in private and in public of that fact.

Now, I do not think we shall gain anything in the way of facilitating the disposition of this bill by limiting debate while there are so many gentlemen who wish to speak and who think they have a right to be heard. So far as I know there is no desire to prolong debate for any dilatory purpose. That has not been the character of the discussion so far. I think the remarks have been made in earnest; gentlemen have meant what they said, and wanted to express their views. I think the discussion had better run on in the same manner.

Mr. SPARKS. How would it suit gentlemen to make a limit of fifteen minutes for each speech?

Mr. CONGER. Some gentlemen have already prepared their remarks with the understanding that they would be entitled to longer time. They wish to deliver their remarks in full—not merely to have them printed as if delivered.

Mr. STEPHENS. How would it do to have a night session?

Mr. SPARKS. As suggested by my friend from Georgia, how would it suit gentlemen if we have a night session for debate only?

Mr. CONGER. On that point I have only this to say, that any man who considers his remarks worthy of being spoken likes to have an audience.

Mr. STEPHENS. There would be a large audience at a night session.

Mr. CONGER. We all know that at night sessions there are not more than ten or fifteen members present, unless business is to be transacted.

Mr. SPARKS. I think that at night we are likely to have a large audience—at least in the galleries—and some of the remarks are directed to them.

Mr. HAYES. And members on the floor seldom listen.

Mr. CONGER. From the demonstrations that there have been in the galleries, I think they have already taken sides.

Mr. SPARKS. They have done so, and will.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest to the gentleman, as I have already done, that if the gentlemen yet to speak be allowed to do so with the same latitude as to time that other members have enjoyed it would be more in accordance with the views of our friends on this side of the House.

Mr. WEAVER. And of the center also.

Mr. CONGER. And as there are a number of gentlemen on the other side who have their names down for speeches, I presume this arrangement would be most agreeable to them.

Mr. McLANE. I want to join my voice to that of the gentleman from Michigan in favor of prolonging the debate. I hope the gentleman who has charge of this bill will not make any effort to limit the time.

Mr. SPARKS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have brought up this question for the purpose of satisfying gentlemen who have spoken to me on the point. The gentleman from Michigan states very correctly the substance of interviews I have had with him and other gentlemen on his side. But it is also true that several gentlemen on that side have indicated a desire for an early termination of this debate, and several on this side express the same wish. Others, however, insist upon the debate going on.

Mr. CONGER. May it not be that those in favor of limiting the debate are those who have already had their hour?

Mr. SPARKS. Precisely; the gentleman has struck it just right. Those who desire the debate to go on are those who have not yet had their say. I have brought this question up now mainly to ascertain the sense of the House, which I think is that the debate should go on.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The only way to test the sense of the House is to submit the question to a vote. The gentleman from Illinois cannot get the sense of the House by getting the views of a few gentlemen. Let him make a motion fixing two o'clock to-morrow for terminating the debate; and if the House wants to vote that motion down, it will do so. How can the gentleman get the sense of the House by putting inquiries to one or two gentlemen?

Mr. SPARKS. I have not yielded to the gentleman from Virginia; but he has thrust his speech into my time, and we have heard it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. All I ask is that the gentleman give the House an opportunity to say by a vote when the debate should terminate.

Mr. SPARKS. I have the floor and do not choose to take the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia unless I like it. I am not asking any individual of this House when debate should end. I am extremely anxious to close it at the earliest possible period; but other gentlemen on this floor have some rights as well as the gentleman from Virginia or myself. I do not propose to choke off this debate, and do not intend to do it if I can help it.

Many MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. SPARKS. But I would like (and I think gentlemen ought to join me in this) to close this debate as early as possible. With this view may we not have unanimous consent for a night session? [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The SPEAKER. It is competent for the House this afternoon by a majority vote to take a recess till the evening.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask my friend from Illinois to give the House a chance to vote on his own proposition to close the debate at two o'clock to-morrow. Let him not assume that the House does not want the debate to end to-morrow, when he does not take the sense of the House by a vote.

Mr. SPARKS. I have never made any motion of that sort, and shall make no such motion. If the gentleman from Virginia wants this debate to close at two o'clock to-morrow let him make a motion to that effect, and let us have a vote on it. I think it would be a little unkind for me to do so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that according to his experience a free and unlimited debate is often the shortest mode to reach a practical result.

Mr. HOUSE. I do not think there is any disposition on either side to limit this debate unreasonably, but it seems to me if we would have a session to-night and another session to-morrow night we might then have it understood that we would come to a vote on the question some time during Friday.

The SPEAKER. The majority of the House could have an even ing session on both nights.

Mr. HOUSE. Very well, then; let us have sessions on both nights.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not expect or desire to participate in the debate on this bill, but I should be very sorry to see it restricted. And I wish to remind members, particularly those who were members of the last House, that this session is a self-imposed luxury which they seem, if we may judge by such evidences as give approval of this playing and acting, to be enjoying. It has certainly been provocative of great applause and much laughter so far, and I do not see why, having inflicted the luxury upon ourselves, we should not let it have free run and course. When we strike "emptyings," which we have not done yet, for the last speeches and the latest of all have had a great many good points, the House will be ready to "shut down;" but, meanwhile, I agree with the Speaker, this is one of the things in which "the longest way round is the shortest way home," and the freer course we give to debate the sooner the question will be disposed of.

Mr. DUNNELL. I desire to make one suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois. I think it would be satisfactory to both sides of the House if to-day and this evening should be devoted to debate on this question under the hour rule.

Mr. KELLEY and other members. Oh, no!

Mr. DUNNELL. And that to-morrow the discussion be devoted to ten-minute speeches. I am satisfied a larger number would thus have an opportunity to express their views, and in a ten-minute speech there are a great many members who can do as much justice to themselves as in having a much longer time. I think there could be a fuller debate under the ten-minute rule on the last day than under the hour rule. I am satisfied for one we have already had debate enough on this question.

Mr. STEPHENS. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the vote be taken at two o'clock on Saturday, and that in the mean time the debate proceed and that sessions be held in the evening.

The SPEAKER. It is always competent for the majority of the House to have an evening session.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, we are not approaching the immediate close of any session regulated by law. So far we have had two afternoons, about four hours each, devoted to the discussion of an exceedingly important question. I think it a little ungracious to attempt now to crowd members into an evening session. If gentlemen will wait a day or two and let this matter have full run the House itself will naturally gravitate to the close of the debate. For one I want to say something, and there are others likely who wish at some time during this discussion to be heard, but I do not wish, after a tiresome day, to be crowded into an evening session. There is no choice about it. Gentlemen tell me I can speak in the afternoon, but I do not know whether I may or not.

I see no good reason why we may not let this thing run a day or two longer. We are costing the country nothing, and I am sorry to say we are not costing the country a little something, for it is necessarily some expense to us. I do not think it quite right that the discussion of one of the most important issues we have had before us in many years should be limited to an afternoon or two, and that whatever else is to be said upon the subject is to be crowded in a night session.

Mr. SPARKS. I wish to say one word.

Mr. STEPHENS. I insist on my motion that debate close at two o'clock on Saturday.

Mr. SPARKS. And that in the mean time we shall have night sessions.

The SPEAKER. It is always competent for the House to take a recess.

Mr. SPARKS. We are now, Mr. Speaker, asking for something in the shape of unanimous consent, and this discussion is proceeding on that principle. I suggest to the gentleman from Connecticut that night sessions be for the purpose, if you please, of allowing those who may desire to do so to discuss the question at that time, compelling no member obtaining the floor in his order to speak at the night session unless he should prefer to do so. Some arrangement of that kind could be reached by unanimous consent I have no doubt. I know there are many gentlemen who would be willing to come here and make speeches during the evening session. There is an order of debate upon the chairman's desk, and those who are reached in their order it might be understood should not be compelled to come here and deliver their remarks at the night session unless they chose to do so. That would certainly remove the difficulty in the mind of the gentleman from Connecticut. In that view I wish this debate to progress so as to be satisfactory to all and for the purpose of expediting the public business.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Now let us have a vote on the question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 80.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he desires to have the time made shorter?

Mr. DUNNELL. I do.

Mr. O'NEILL. He desires, then, that the debate shall close before two o'clock on Saturday?

Mr. DUNNELL. That is my desire, to have less time for the debate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Then offer an amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. At what time does the gentleman propose that the debate shall close?

Mr. DUNNELL. I would say; let it close on Friday.

The SPEAKER. The House is now dividing.

Mr. BUCKNER. Then those gentlemen who want a shorter time ought to vote "no."

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 90.

So the motion of Mr. STEPHENS, that the debate should close at two o'clock on Saturday, was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I now move that the debate be closed at four o'clock on Friday.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest that by fixing a time at which the vote must be taken we will carry the debate to that time. If it is left open we may be able to get through with the debate before the time mentioned by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. DUNNELL. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I move that that motion be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will reach his object by voting against the proposition. It is not usual to lay on the table a motion of this character.

Mr. STEPHENS. I suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota to make the hour two o'clock on Friday. Four o'clock is too late. We will be kept here till eight or nine o'clock with the different votes.

Mr. DUNNELL. I will say three o'clock. I modify my motion accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that at three o'clock on Friday debate, both general and under the five-minute rule, on the pending proposition, be closed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not propose now to close the debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we should not at this time include the debate under the five-minute rule for amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, then, will state the motion differently. The Chair now understands the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota to be that all general debate on the pending proposition shall be closed on Friday at three o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which debate was ordered to be closed at three o'clock on Friday; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Let us understand the effect of the motion just adopted. As I understand, it applies only to general debate.

The SPEAKER. Yes; general debate in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. That is all right.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPARKS. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed with the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] is entitled to the floor for forty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to think that about all I had intended to say on this bill originally has already been said by others, and better said than I could say it. Yet having in my own mind, some time since, staked off the ground, if I may have the attention of the committee for a short time I will, in the plain, home language of the West, claim my pre-emption to so much of the remnants as I may.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this whole matter resolves itself into a question, first, of jurisdiction; second, of power; and that under whatever jurisdiction elections be held, whether State or national, two things are absolute and indispensable—purity at the ballot-box; peace at the polls. It is idle to talk about an election anywhere unless these two things can be secured; and whatever power may be necessary to secure them should be exerted or representative government is a failure. If all the power of the Government is required to secure them, then all the power of the Government should be put forth, whether exerted through the State or national administration. However the power be applied, the order and climax of its application is the same. If it be under the jurisdiction of the State, then, in the first instance, there stand the courts, back of the courts the sheriff, back of the sheriff the posse comitatus, and back of all the militia. If it be exerted through Federal jurisdiction, then, in the same order, there first stand the courts, back of the courts the marshal, back of the marshal the posse, and beyond all as a final and last resort the Federal troops. Wherever the power be lodged the essence and common sense of the thing is the same. Physical force in some form is necessary to overcome resistance to civil law, and the physical enforcement of civil law ends first at the policeman's club and last at the bayonet. There has been a good deal of talk, even on the part of republicans, about "bayonet rule" in this country, which, if I may be allowed the expression, I think borders on the nonsensical if not the absurd.

Sir, I know and have read of no government in history, or that exists to-day, which does not rely ultimately for its preservation and authority on coercive force as a last resort, and whoever talks about a government without this, in my judgment, talks of Utopia.

The one government on earth which has come nearer to this ideal than all others is this self-same Government of the United States. I know of no bayonet rule here, except, first, to win independence and maintain God-given rights; and, second, to put down one of the most cruel and causeless rebellions that ever cursed the earth; and lastly, to prevent our Southern friends from indulging in the delectable pastime of shooting negroes on sight. [Applause.]

Sir, the expression may be a harsh one, but if the whine and whimper about "bayonet rule" which has come wailing down the wind since the surrender and forgiveness at Appomattox be unworthy of a chivalric people, then what shall be said of it when indulged in by republicans? When in all history was such leniency ever shown a fallen foe before? And when was proffered mercy ever treated with loftier contempt? Gentlemen may say that the enforcement of law rests upon the consent of the governed. Ah, sir, the consent of the governed is that consent where, under a free Constitution and fair elections, not only the consent but the will of the people becomes formulated and crystallized into public law; where not only the power to make laws is exerted, but the duty to enforce them is enjoined; and thus it is that obedience to law, absolute and unquestioned while it is the law, becomes the foundation-stone of free government.

Sir, this House and the country has seldom been more startled or gratified than on Saturday last by the masterly, I may say the gigantic, manner in which the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] portrayed the absolute necessity for the free action of Congress and the President in the enactment of laws. If the distinguished gentleman had chosen to go further he could, with a power of language which I can never hope to command, have portrayed with equal force and clearness the necessity for peace, purity, and absolute freedom at the ballot-box, where not only the power to make laws is granted, but where Congresses and Presidents are made and unmade as well.

Sir, I heard with interest and read with attention the remarks on Friday last of the able and accomplished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] touching that provision of the Constitution contained in section 4, article 4, which provides that the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence. It requires no argument to establish, because it cannot be successfully contradicted, that when the Constitution confers a power or enjoins a duty upon the United States that such power can only be exerted through the auxiliary agency of law. The gentleman from Kentucky argued clear up to the line, but he did not cross it by so much as the breadth of a hair. If I recollect aright he refrained from citing that other clause of the Constitution, section 3, article 2, which provides that the President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

It needed no argument to convince anybody that when the Constitution vests a power in the Government of the United States a law of Congress is necessary to marshal and set that power in motion, but when by the express and explicit language of the Constitution itself a power is vested in the President and a duty enjoined upon him, I ask gentlemen what act of a governor, what act of a State Legislature, what act even of Congress itself, can take that power away or exempt the President from the performance of the duty? I need not tell lawyers that if Congress legislates in such a case at all it must be in aid and not in contravention of the power. What is the measure and extent of this power? Whatever is reasonable, requisite, and necessary for the enforcement of the law. If it can be done by the civil power, that is the extent; if it requires military power, that must be invoked, because the primal fundamental condition is that the laws be faithfully executed.

Mr. Chairman, if the laws be not enforced, there lies nothing beyond but the dark sea of anarchy, danger, and revolution. Is not this, rather than the sword, the first great cause which leads to the downfall of republics?

Sir, if my good friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will grant me the loan of his illustration for a moment, I will say that in my judgment right here lies the chip, under the heel of the republican giant, on which his foot has been slipping since the year 1874, when the republican party first began virtually to acquiesce in the non-enforcement of the laws!

Mr. Chairman, if we have an earnest people and an honest God, I believe that the outrages, the cruelties, the unspeakable atrocities which fill the dark valley between that period and this, never will be condoned, and never ought to be condoned, until the American people, East, West, North, and South, shall rise in the nobility of manhood and the majesty of might and declare as one man that now, henceforth, and forever these hellish deeds shall cease. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have on another occasion recently argued before this House and attempted to show that under section 4, article 1, of the Constitution, which provides that Congress may make or alter regulations for the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, except as to the places of choosing Senators, Congress has full and ample power to enact these election laws now proposed to be repealed. I do not care to go into that question here; but it seems to me that to deny it is to say that this language of the Constitution is surplusage, and that Hamilton, Madison, and Story when they wrote about it did not understand what they were writing.

If, then, these be constitutional laws, and if the President is commanded to take care that they as well as all other laws of the United States be faithfully executed, then his power is complete. And if these laws are not constitutional, there is a very easy method of settling that question in the courts. Certainly it cannot be necessary to settle it by the revolutionary methods here proposed.

Grant, then, that it exists, and where does this power of the President, to see that the laws be faithfully executed, extend? Why, manifestly, wherever the laws of the United States extend. If there be a square rood, a square rod, or a square foot of ground in this country where the laws and jurisdiction of the United States do not go, then there this power does not extend, but if there be not then there is not a square foot, or a square yard of territory where it does not exist, or where within this proper jurisdiction the President, if necessary to execute the laws of the United States, may not station troops, whether, in the language of my friend from Ohio on the right, [Mr. KEIFER,] it be at the polls or in the church of Christ.

Sir, there is no place in this country so sacred but that the laws should be enforced and obeyed. The duty of the United States when called upon to aid in the enforcement of State laws comes under that other provision of the Constitution which in my humble judgment is not at all involved in this discussion. Now if this power be granted, the method of its application and enforcement has already been settled, and, I think, settled right by democratic precedent; settled in that case of Anthony Burns in Boston in 1854, which in the forum of conscience and the enlightenment of the age partook of barbarism, but passing by the constitutionality of the law itself involved the cold abstract propositions of law, proper to be settled though they bound the fetters stronger on the trembling limbs of a fugitive slave. In that case President Franklin Pierce called upon his Attorney-General, Caleb Cushing, both regarded as tolerably sound democrats, for his opinion as to whether the United States troops might be used by the United States marshal as a posse comitatus to aid in the arrest of Burns against the resistance of the citizens of Massachusetts.

In this opinion Mr. Cushing, speaking of the posse comitatus and the power of the marshal to summon it, says:

This authority comprehends not only bystanders and other citizens generally, but any and all organized armed forces, whether militia of the State or officers, soldiers, sailors, and marines of the United States; and if the object of resistance to the marshal be to obstruct and defeat the execution of the provisions of the Constitution or acts of Congress the expenses of such posse comitatus are properly charged to the United States.

Again, in the same opinion, he says:

To guard against violence by wrong-headed, misguided, disloyal citizens, or by foreign force, is an important obligation of every government—the grand purpose and consideration, indeed, for which it is instituted. Hence, when the officer of the law deems it necessary and proper to raise the posse comitatus to aid and assist him in executing the process of the law, the extraordinary expense thereby incurred is properly payable by the Government. * * * These conditions apply as well to the military as to the civil force employed, for the posse comitatus comprises every person in the district or county above the age of fifteen years, (Watson, sheriff, page 60,) whatever may be their position, whether civilians or not, and including the military of all denominations. * * * The fact that they are organized as military bodies, under the immediate command of their own officers, does not in any way affect their legal character. They are still the posse comitatus, (21 Pol. His., pp. 672-678, per Lord Mansfield.)

Here we have the question settled by the highest English and American authorities, and re-enforcing them is the act of Congress of the 29th of July, 1861, which provides:

That the marshals of the several districts of the United States, and their deputies, shall have the same powers in executing the laws of the United States as sheriffs and their deputies in the several States have by law in executing the laws of their respective States.

And still re-enforcing this power is the act of the 28th of February, 1871, entitled "An act to amend an act approved May 31, 1870, entitled 'An act to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of the Union, and for other purposes;'" which provides that when the marshal or his deputies shall be forcibly resisted in executing their duties or "shall by violence, threats, or menace be prevented from executing such duties, or from arresting any person or persons who shall commit any offense for which said marshal or his general or his special deputies are authorized to make such arrest, are, and each of them is hereby, empowered to summon and call to his or their aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of his district."

There, sir, in the Constitution and the laws is the arsenal of power whence the President may draw any weapon, whether civil or military, necessary for the faithful execution of the laws.

And it seems to me that the whole question of using troops to preserve peace at the polls hinges upon this: do we intend to surrender to the States exclusive and absolute control of all elections whether State or national? If we do, then there can be no object in holding on to a power which we could only exert at the request and by the direction of a State, and which is abundantly provided for, as I have said, in another part of the Constitution. But if, on the other hand, we intend to maintain the position that the Constitution confers upon the General Government power, ultimate and absolute, to control Federal elections, and that the present condition of the country imperatively demands the exercise of this power, then with all due deference to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] instead of regarding this as a mere question on the skirmish line, I regard it as the very center and citadel of the situation. Upon the power "to keep peace at the polls" depends ultimately the whole question of Federal authority and self-preservation.

I have heard it suggested somewhere that as there was to be no general election this year, perhaps for the sake of peace, in this era of good feeling and good-will, this power might be surrendered by way of compromise; or, in other words, that we might consent to let the tiger into the house and then see if we can pull him out by the ears. Sir, we do not expect to declare war during the next year; we hope not to have to declare it for the next hundred years; yet who would favor the surrender on the part of Congress of the power to declare war? Most men do not expect to kill an assailant in self-defense during their natural lives; yet who would surrender that right for a week, or even for a day?

I think it is the fervent prayer of the people of this country that it may never be necessary to march troops to the polls to keep the peace on election days again; but if it be necessary, who would take that power away?

Mr. Chairman, it is not a pleasant sight, I grant you, to see American citizens march to the polls between lines of bristling steel; but it is just as unpleasant to see honest voters, who have gone there to exercise their rights under the Constitution, met by bludgeons, bowie-knives, shot-guns, and revolvers. [Applause.] Do we propose, in the great cities of this country, to perpetuate the farce of setting up stool-pigeons at the polls, in the persons of United States supervisors, having no power to repel insult or command respect? And is that the thing we are struggling for now?

Go down to Kingstree, in South Carolina, at the election of 1878 and what do you behold there? A United States supervisor ejected from the room where the ballot-boxes were, and where the laws of the United States require him to be? Yet, remembering his duties, and perhaps the penalties which the law imposes for their non-performance, he procures an empty tobacco packing-box, places it on an outside platform, climbs up on it, and there, representing the power, the authority, and the dignity of the United States Government, peeps through the window and performs his duty as well as he can! But is he permitted to remain unmolested? Not at all; just before the sun wheels down in the west, a gang of roughs appear upon the scene; and seizing the tobacco-box, that great palladium of American liberty, hurls it and its occupant down the steps of the building, and rolls the dignity and power of the United States Government in the dust. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, that right then and there the United States was made "to eat the leek," to taste garlic, and from that time to the wee small hours of the morning onion-skin ballots went in unchallenged but not uncounted. [Applause.]

But were there no arrests for a thing like that? Why, of course there were, Mr. Chairman. The supervisor, going before a United States commissioner to swear out a warrant, was himself arrested upon State process for perjury, and both he and the commissioner were incarcerated in the common jail! Yet why should we object to these things "in this era of peace and good-will?" And yet this is the farce which we call an election, where members of Congress are chosen whose single vote may shape legislation and change the whole civil administration of the Government. And to secure this our opponents are willing to resort to revolutionary methods!

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to revive the sad and bitter memories of the war; neither have I any disposition to shrink from doing so when the cause of justice and right demands their revival. When was the law now proposed to be repealed enacted, and what were the circumstances that led up to its enactment? It was introduced into the Senate by Lazarus W. Powell, of Kentucky, on the 5th day of June, 1864, in the dreadest hour of the nation's struggle, when the earth was iron, the sky was brass, and there was darkness everywhere; in the very year in which the democratic party declared the war for the Union a failure, and the patriotic people walked by faith, hoping under God for victory. It was at such a time that the bill was introduced. Who was its author and what were the evils it was designed to remedy? I send to the Clerk's desk volume 50 of the Globe, and ask to have read the passages marked on pages 102 and 103 of that volume.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SAULSBURY. Well, then, since the Senator has chosen to deny that there has been any impropriety on the part of the military in their interference with the freedom of elections in the States, I cannot sit quietly as a Senator from what was once a State of the American Union, and the first to adopt the Constitution under which we live, without saying to that Senator that I have seen the armed soldiery (acting under the command, I suppose, of "the powers that be") appear at the polls at which I myself had a right, according to the constitution and laws of my State, to vote, and there, by positive interference, drive men from the polls, take some men who had done naught in violation of the law of the land, either Federal or State, and incarcerate them in the county prison; and no longer ago, sir, than last November, in the county in which I live, as soon as the voters arrived on the ground, before they had offered to vote, before they had approached the polls, the soldiery seized them, fastened them up, and kept them confined.

* * * * * * *

I am proud to say, sir, that the majority of the legal voters of my State, not choosing to have any conflict with the national authorities, choosing rather to be disfranchised than to have their soil stained with blood, or to give the pretext to this Administration to say that they were not peaceable, law-abiding citizens, refrained from voting and throughout the whole State there were but twelve or fourteen votes cast for the democratic candidate. But suppose, sir, they could have had a right to vote, suppose they had been allowed to vote by taking the oath prescribed, what right has any military officer in a State not in revolt, in a State where there has been no attempt at revolution, in a State where no political organization has ever avowed any hostility to the Union, to step in and say, "You, you, the proud citizen of a State and of the United States shall hold from me your right of voting for a member to represent you in Congress, or (as at the election before) for members to represent you in your own State Legislature; you shall have a right to vote, if you will do my bidding and swear to what I shall dictate to you!

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. This, Mr. Chairman, is a grave affair, and that we may discover if possible the source of these grievances, I now send up volume 53 of the Globe, and ask the Clerk to read the passage marked on page 3194, being the order of Major-General George B. McClellan, dated October 29, 1861.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
Washington, October 29, 1861.

GENERAL: There is an apprehension among Union citizens in many parts of Maryland of an attempt at interference with their rights of suffrage by disunion citizens on the occasion of the election to take place on the 6th of November next.

In order to prevent this, the major-general commanding directs that you send detachments of a sufficient number of men to the different points in your vicinity where the elections are to be held to protect the Union voters, and to see that no disunionists are allowed to intimidate them or in any way to interfere with their rights.

He also desires you to arrest and hold in confinement till after the election all disunionists who are known to have returned from Virginia recently, and who show themselves at the polls, and to guard effectually against any invasion of the peace and order of the election. For the purpose of carrying out these instructions you are authorized to suspend the habeas corpus. General Stone has received similar instructions to these. You will please confer with him as to the particular points that each shall take the control of.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. B. MARCY,
Chief of Staff.

Major-General N. P. BANKS,
Commanding Division, Muddy Branch, Maryland.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Similar orders were issued by other generals in command covering Kentucky, Missouri, and other States.

When the bill was introduced into the Senate a controversy arose as to whether it should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary or the Committee on Military Affairs, of which latter committee Henry Wilson was chairman. I now ask the Clerk to read from page 105 of the Globe, volume 50.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WILSON. The motion is to refer this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. I am certainly willing that it should go to my committee if the Senate so order; but I wish distinctly to say before the vote is taken that I am opposed to any action whatever on the subject-matter embraced in it. I am opposed to action for the reason that I am in favor of what the Government has done. I shall stand by this action of the Government here, elsewhere, and at all coming times. It is a fact, and we know it, that in the States of Delaware and Maryland there are traitors as bitter and hostile to the Government of the United States as there are in the States of Virginia and South Carolina.

* * * * * * *

I am in favor of administering the oath of allegiance to members of the Senate and of the Government, and of requiring men to swear loyalty to their country. I am in favor of keeping from the ballot-boxes of the country any man who is not willing to take the oath of allegiance to the country in this hour of its trial. We know that in Delaware, in Maryland, in Kentucky, and in Missouri there are men who, throughout this rebellion, have been for the rebellion, and have been more or less active in the cause of the rebellion.

I justify the action of the Government, and I hope it will continue so to act till the close of the rebellion; for I see plainly that the men who cannot succeed by bloody war will, when baffled and defeated by our brave soldiers in the field, rush to the ballot-box, hoping there to win what they could not conquer in the field. I hope the policy of the nation will be to require these men, when they approach the ballot-box to take part in the government of the country, to swear before Almighty God fidelity to the country. The Government is false and recreant if it allows a traitor who shrinks from taking such an oath to put a vote in the ballot-box.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I will now ask the Clerk to read from page 87, volume 53, (appendix,) of the Globe, the remarks of Senator Howard, of Michigan, one of the broadest statesmen, ablest lawyers, truest patriots this conntry has ever produced.

The Clerk read as follows:

In introducing the resolution of expulsion against the author of the bill, Mr. Davis (I am obliged to call his name for distinction's sake) in the preamble of that resolution recites the following facts:

"Whereas Lazarus W. Powell, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, after eleven States had published their ordinances of secession by which to sever themselves from the Government of the United States, had formed a confederacy and provisional government and made war upon the United States, did, on the 20th day of June last, at the city of Henderson, in the State of Kentucky, attend a large southern State-rights convention, over which he was called to and did preside; and on taking his seat as president thereof made a speech in which he stated the object of said convention and then appointed a committee which reported to said convention a long series of resolutions that were unanimously adopted by it. Among those resolutions are the following:

"Second. That the war being now waged by the Federal administration against the Southern States is in violation of the Constitution and laws and has already been attended with such stupendous usurpations as to amaze the world and endanger every safeguard of constitutional liberty.

"That the recall of the invading armies and the recognition of the separate independence of the Confederate States is the true policy to restore peace and preserve the relations of fraternal love and amity between the States.

* * * * * * *

"Sixth. That we heartily approve the refusal of Governor Magoffin to furnish Kentucky troops to subjugate the South; and we cordially indorse his recent proclamation defining the position of Kentucky in accordance with the sentiment of her people, and forbidding the invasion of Kentucky by Federal or confederate troops."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. The Senator's colleague, in the course of his speech on that resolution, speaking of the principles of the Senator to whom I am alluding, said:

They were as well known to me before I left the State of Kentucky to come to this city to take my seat as a representative in the Senate from that State as they are at this day. With this full knowledge on the part of my constituency and of myself, they have no more united or earnest desire than that my colleague should be removed from his seat.

Again, in the course of the same speech, the same Senator [Mr. Davis] said:

Mr. President, it was a dreadful, and for a long time a doubtful, struggle in that State which party would prevail and control its destiny. The popular mind of the State of Kentucky had to be educated against all their sympathies, all their interests, all their business connections, and against the feelings and sympathies of their brethren in the South before they could be induced to take a position in favor of the Union and of their Government against them.

Again, this is the further testimony of the colleague of the Senator who produced this bill:

Mr. President, what was the duty of my colleague at that time, that eventful and doubtful time? His position, his principles, his moral power as an ex-governor of the State of Kentucky, and as a Senator representing that State in the Senate of the United States were all thrown against the Government of the Union and in favor of the rebellion and of the secessionists. I challenge him to produce a single act of his, public or private, from that time to the present, that ever evinced the least interest in or sympathy for his own Government, or the smallest purpose to support or uphold that Government according to the obligation of his constitutional oath. I challenge him to produce a single act, public or private, of his the tendency of which was not to strengthen the rebellion, to give it complete and final success, to disrupt this Union, and to overthrow the Constitution of the United States.

Such, Mr. Chairman, was the occasion and such the author of the bill for restraining the use of Federal troops at the polls; and it is a noticeable fact that the language contained in this printed bill now before us is the precise language of this same Lazarus W. Powell as he proposed that the bill should finally pass the Senate.

Mr. PHISTER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. It would give me great pleasure to yield to the gentleman, but, as he sees, my time is nearly gone, and I am compelled to curtail my own remarks in consequence.

Mr. Chairman, the question has been asked during this debate what was meant by the "armed enemies of the United States?" The history of that is this: The bill originally provided that troops should not be brought nearer than one mile from the polls. The point was raised by the republicans, what if the confederate forces should on election day intrench themselves within this circuit of one mile, the Union forces would have no power to dislodge them. And to meet this objection the words "armed enemies of the United States" were inserted in the bill. And then, upon motion of the republicans, the words "or to keep peace at the polls" were also inserted; and then enough republicans in both Houses voted for the bill to make it a law.

But it must be remembered that though introduced in the Senate on the 5th of June, 1864, it did not become a law until the 25th of February, 1865. Then the crisis had passed, the elections had been held, patriotism had triumphed, immortal victories had been won in the field. The confederacy had been found to be but a hollow shell. Its soldiers were tattered and starving, and it was but a question of time when the brave boys of the North should come "marching home again;" home to a land, it is true, filled with broken and bleeding hearts, but to a land, thank Heaven, devoted to liberty and dedicated to law. [Applause.]

Just so soon as the emergency had passed, this power, which I grant you was a dangerous one when used in States not in rebellion, and which nothing could justify but the supremest necessities of war, was taken away, curbed, restrained, put under the civil authority, and enacted into statutory law. There, Mr. Chairman, it remains to-day. And there, under God, so far as republicans are concerned, it shall remain forever. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I shall devote the portion of time allotted to me mainly to two observations which fell from the lips of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who spoke last Saturday. One of the observations of that gentleman was that we have reached a period in this country when there is danger of destruction of the Government, because it may be "starved to death" by a failure of proper appropriations for carrying on the operations of the Government. I shall first call the attention of the House to that assertion, and inquire whether there be any foundation for it or not, and, if so, I shall seek to ascertain who will be responsible for "starving the Government."

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the situation of the appropriations for the ensuing year? I shall call your attention to what is in the record and known to all. There are twelve appropriation bills providing the necessary supplies for the Government. Of these ten were passed by the democratic House in the last Congress before its adjournment, were approved by the Senate and the President, and have gone into effect. The remaining two appropriation bills were likewise passed by the democratic House of Representatives before its adjournment, and were sent to the Senate. But these two bills were not approved by the Senate, and for that reason failed to go into effect, as I shall more fully explain further on. I call attention to the fact that every appropriation bill providing every necessary dollar for the expenditures of the Government in the ensuing year was passed by the democratic House of Representatives before the adjournment of the Forty-fifth Congress on the 4th of March last. Why, then, have two bills which I shall soon name failed to become law? For the simple reason that the Senate refused to pass them as enacted by the House, basing their refusal on the ground that we had inserted sections of the statutes which authorize the use of Federal soldiers at the polls as a guard against breach of peace, and the employment of supervisors and deputy marshals at the voting places on the day of election, and the requirement of political test oaths by jurors in Federal courts.

Of the two bills which thus failed the democratic majority in this House now comes with one and offers to appropriate over $26,000,000, defraying the entire expenses of the Army for the ensuing year. The democratic House of Representatives will pass that bill as soon as we reach a vote on it, and I feel confident this bill will pass the democratic Senate. I feel further warranted in saying that the democratic House will follow up this bill with the only remaining appropriation bill, which will make sufficient provision for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government, and that both the House and Senate will in that bill appropriate all the remainder needed to carry on the operations of the Government. There is no dispute between the parties in Congress, and I apprehend there will be none between Congress and the Executive, as to the amounts we propose to appropriate, for a conference committee of both Houses and both parties in the last Congress agreed before its adjournment to the amounts we offer to appropriate as satisfactory. If these bills pass into law, we can adjourn and go home in peace. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the democratic House and Senate pass these two bills, and they fail, who is responsible for the failure? If this Government is starved to death by the failure of these two bills, can the authorship of that sad calamity be laid at the door of the democratic party?

I do not know by what authority the gentleman from Ohio spoke when he intimated to this House that these two bills will fail because they will not receive the sanction of the President of the United States; but if he speaks truthfully, if his prophecies are verified, and the republican party in Congress sustains his veto, is there a man in this country so ignorant or so blinded with prejudice who will not see that those bills will fail solely because the President will have interposed his veto, and that he will have been sustained therein by his partisans on this floor? Can any one be found so reckless of truth as to deny in such a contingency that this responsibility will rest with the President and his party in Congress? The gentleman from Ohio says (and perhaps bases his prophecy upon that assumption) that these two bills contain provisions which will not be acceptable to the President—not because the substance of the provisions does not meet with his approval, but, forsooth, because they are sought to be imposed upon this bill through an unusual and "revolutionary method"—and he brings against the democratic party the serious charge of being guilty of "revolution" in this legislation. Why? Simply because the democratic House of Representatives, in passing these appropriation bills, will place provisions upon them which repeal certain sections of the statute which I have indicated. What are these provisions? The two provisions sought to be placed on the Army bill now before us are solely for the purpose of repealing the law authorizing the use of soldiers to keep the peace at the polls on election day. The other provisions with regard to elections, to be placed upon the legislative, &c., bill, repeal those portions of the statutes which authorize the employment of an unlimited number of Federal deputy marshals and chief supervisors or overseers at the voting places, who have heretofore been, and will hereafter be, under republican administration, to a very considerable extent, mere recruiting sergeants for the republican party, while pretending to discharge a public duty. The only other provision is introduced in order that when any man is accused of crime in this land he shall be tried by an impartial jury composed of his peers. In other words, we insist upon these amendments for the purpose of restoring the law as it existed prior to 1865 and 1872, and in order that every citizen in the exercise of his sovereignty at the polls shall be a free man, unawed by power, unintimidated by bayonets, and unmolested by deputy marshals and jailers, and that juries shall be selected without reference to political sentiment or opinion. These are the principles against which the republican party in this House has arrayed itself, and their leader has threatened to starve the Government to death rather than permit their vindication and establishment. The issue is squarely formed, and we are defiantly, arrogantly notified that unless we yield these principles, so dear to our hearts as American freemen, the wheels of Government will be blocked, for, in speaking of the opposition of his party to the repeal of these tyrannical enactments, the gentleman from Ohio tells us, "You shall not compel us, you shall not coerce us, even to save the Government."

It is asserted by the gentleman from Ohio that the method by which we are seeking to repeal these laws is "revolutionary." If this method be revolutionary I want to know that fact; and I wish further to look beyond the present and ascertain who are the authors of this "revolutionary" method. I have before me records showing that this is no new invention originating with the democratic party of the Forty-fifth or Forty-sixth Congress. I have before me records showing that this method of legislation has been practiced in the past; and I say now in passing that if the President vetoes these two bills because of the provisions we propose to tack on to them it cannot be for the reason that he regards the method by which we endeavor to effect this object as "revolutionary." He will not veto them for any such reason if he is guided by his own action of the past and by the precedents and practices of the republican party itself in Congress. What are those precedents and practices? It is not the first time that general legislation has been incorporated into an appropriation bill. Those who examine the record will discover that the precedents for it are numerous.

At the opening of the Mexican war, when there was a factious opposition in Congress to the declaration of war, a provision was inserted into the Army appropriation bill and enacted into law declaring that war existed with Mexico.

Another instance occurred at the end of that war when it was desired to make an appropriation in order to carry out arrangements for peace. It was insisted upon, and a proviso was inserted into the appropriation bill declaring that slavery should be excluded from the territory acquired from Mexico.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will come down to a more recent period. In 1857 or rather 1856 the republican party for the first time in the history of the country obtained ascendency in the House of Representatives. It was the time when Nathaniel P. Banks was elected Speaker. It is a period within the recollection perhaps of every gentleman upon this floor. What was done during that time when the very same kind of bill that is before the House to-day, the Army appropriation bill was under consideration in this Hall? A gentleman, who then represented a district from Ohio, by the name of John Sherman, the same John Sherman who is now Secretary of the Treasury and one of the constitutional advisers of the President of the United States, moved an amendment to that bill prohibiting the use of United States troops for the purpose of aiding in the enforcement of the territorial laws of Kansas. It further declared that the President of the United States should disarm the organized militia of the Territory of Kansas. Still further, that he should prevent armed men from going into the Territory of Kansas either to aid in the enforcement or resistance of real or pretended laws. I submit that was a provision of similar nature to the one now proposed to be added to these bills.

The principal leader of the republican party in the House when that proviso was under consideration was the venerable Joshua R. Giddings, who was known in that day as "Father Giddings," because he was regarded as the father of the republican party. Points of order and objections were raised against that proviso based on some of the grounds now urged, but what did Joshua R. Giddings say then. If I am not mistaken he represented a part of the district that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] now represents. What was his answer to the point of order and objections raised? I have the record of it in my hand. It is to be found in the Congressional Globe containing the proceedings of July 29, 1856. He used these words in support of that amendment:

I now come to the point that when we make an appropriation we may limit its expenditures. That principle has been held to be legitimate since the commencement of the Government.

What further did old Joshua R. Giddings say:

I am only quoting precedents, and I call upon the Chair to examine that point that where we make an appropriation of money we, the Representatives of the people, may limit the expenditure in just such terms as we please.

Sir, Giddings may have been fanatical, but no man can justly accuse him of being a demagogue. He was a brave and sincere man. Now, when the gentleman wants to find a revolutionist of the sort he described let him go to the cradle of his party, let him look at the history of the men who gave birth to his party, who breathed into it the breath of life; let him recall the name of one of his most distinguished predecessors upon this floor; let him go to the other end of the Avenue and look into the council chamber of the President of the United States and gaze upon Hon. John Sherman, who was just such a revolutionist in 1857.

Mr. Chairman, if you will look over the list of names registered in favor of imposing general legislation upon the Army appropriation bill of 1857 you will find that every republican in the Congress of that day, with perhaps one exception, was a revolutionist according to the definition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

You will find in that list the name of Schuyler Colfax, a stalwart supporter of such revolutionary methods, he who was afterwards the republican Speaker of this House for years, then Vice-President of the United States, and who was a demi-god of the republican party until he fell because of the exposure of the Credit Mobilier fraud—that black cloud which burst over the household of the republican party and wrecked so many of its idols. These are the men who were revolutionists and by their revolutionary method they occasioned an extra session of Congress in 1856 in the same manner that eventuated this extra session.

But, sir, I must hurry on. I wish to come down to another period in the history of this country when the same sort of revolution was sought as the gentleman charges is being sought here to-day. It was in 1867; Andrew Johnson was President of the United States, and the republican party was in complete control of both branches of Congress. It was antagonistic to President Johnson. What was done in that year? In the Senate of the United States an amendment was offered to the Army appropriation bill stripping the President of his constitutional right to be the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States. I have that amendment before me, and I assert here that if you search the archives of this Government from its foundation to this day, you will fail to find an act more thoroughly unconstitutional than this one which was introduced into Congress in 1867 and passed by both Houses while under the control of the republican party.

Let me call your attention to one or two features of that amendment. It is well known to all that the Constitution in plain and explicit language constitutes the President and none other than the President the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States. I will read the second section of that amendment which was inserted in the Army appropriation bill for the purpose of coercing the consent of the President to the enactment of a vile unconstitutional law intended for his degradation. Mr. Chairman, the democratic party does not seek to insert in these bills any proviso which tends to degrade the Executive or which can in any manner be offensive to him. The democratic party has too much patriotism, honor, and decency to offer such an insult to the Chief Magistrate of the Republic:

That the headquarters of the General of the Army of the United States shall be at the city of Washington, and all orders and instructions relating to military operations issued by the President or Secretary of War shall be issued through the General of the Army, and in case of his inability through the next in rank. The General of the Army shall not be removed, suspended, or relieved from command or assigned to duty elsewhere than at said headquarters, except at his own request, without the previous approval of the Senate, and any orders—and any orders or instructions relating to military operations issued contrary to the requirements of this section shall be null and void.

Mark this language—

The Constitution declared the President shall be the rightful Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States; the republican Congress of the United States declared that if he issued any orders, save and except through General Grant, who at that day was the General of the United States Army, his orders should be null and void. But what further did they do? They further declared:

> Any officer of the Army who shall transmit, convey, or obey any orders or instructions so issued contrary to the provisions of this section, knowing that such orders were so issued, shall be liable to imprisonment for not less than two nor more than twenty years, upon conviction thereof in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Why, think of it! The Constitution making the President Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, the republican Senate and House, by an amendment to an Army bill, mind you, declare that every man who obeys an order issued from the President of the United States contrary to the provisions of that section is a felon, and that he shall be punished as such by imprisonment from two to twenty years. When the gentleman denounces those who favor this method of legislation as being guilty of treason or revolution his maledictions fall as well upon the heads of Charles Sumner, of Henry Wilson, of EDMUNDS, and the leaders of the republican party in both Houses of the Congress of 1867.

But, Mr. Chairman, I must hurry on. I come now to another period in the history of this country, and I here propose to show how inconsistent the gentleman from Ohio has been on this question. You will see that every bitter epithet he has hurled at the majority in this House, like "chickens that come home to roost" return to plague their inventor.

In 1872 in the Senate, which was then a republican body, one of these very provisions which we now seek to modify was tacked on to the sundry civil appropriation bill and passed the Senate. When that bill came into this House, which was then likewise a republican body, with that provision upon it, every democrat leaped to his feet to denounce the measure, not only as unconstitutional, but as an outrageous violation of the right of suffrage and the liberties of the people. What, sir, occurred? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was then, as now, the leader of the republican party in this House. How did he answer the objections of the vigilant and indignant democrats on this floor? He said to them, perhaps as defiantly and as vehemently as he said to us the other day, that those who sought to defeat the will of the majority of this House were revolutionists; that those who sought to defeat action upon the appropriation bill containing that amendment, that general legislation on an appropriation bill, were guilty of an effort to overturn the Government. I remember the reading of the language used by the gentleman on that occasion well enough to substantially quote it. He here, in this House, declared in plain and explicit terms that the resistance of those who sought to defeat the will of the majority in Congress was revolutionary and thereby they sought to overturn parliamentary government. He threatened to keep Congress in session from that time (June) until December in order to crush the opposition. Thus he spoke after leading his party on this floor in a dead-lock for three days on account of that legislation.

But how did the gentleman speak last Saturday in this House? Oh, what a wonderful change has come over the spirit of his dreams! He has completely reversed his position. He was here on Saturday denouncing those who sought to introduce such legislation on appropriation bills as revolutionists and as seeking to overturn this Government. In June, 1872, he denounced the democratic party as revolutionary (it is not a new word with the gentleman) because being in the minority it dared to resist the will of the majority in shaping such legislation as it desired on an appropriation bill. In March, 1879, he denounces the same party as revolutionary because it is resisting the will of the minority in shaping legislation as it desires. He blew hot in 1872; he blows cold in 1879. Was ever such inconsistency seen in Congress? But, Mr. Chairman, let me come down to a still more recent period and see whether this legislation can be regarded as revolutionary or not. In the last Congress—the second session of the last Congress—we passed the Army appropriation bill, containing what is known as the posse comitatus clause. It was legislation exactly similar in its nature to this. That bill went to the President of the United States. Did he in holy horror withhold his pen from the indorsement of that bill because it contained revolutionary legislation? Oh, no sir; your President at that day had an opportunity of putting himself on record on this question, and he has by his act told you that this method of legislation is not revolutionary but meets with his approval. Therefore, I say, sir, if the President is guided by his own past action, as well as the precedents and practices of the republican party, he will sign this bill, unless he may disapprove of the merits of the provisions that are offered, but he cannot consistently refuse his sanction on any assumption that the method of this repeal is unusual or revolutionary. If you gentlemen will examine the record already made by your President, you will find a rebuke for your absurd and bombastic anathemas at this course of the democratic party.

One other circumstance, sir, and then I will pass away from this point. Are these two provisions which we have inserted in the Army bill, and which are the only ones now directly under consideration, dangerous in their character?

The gentleman from Ohio had an opportunity on the 4th day of March last to pass his opinion upon them. And what was the position taken by him then? It is the same provision except simply this modification with regard to the appointment of the two supervisors which are retained in this bill, but whose offices were abolished by the bill then under consideration. What was the language of the gentleman from Ohio on the 4th day of March last, when the bill was more objectionable from his stand-point than it is now? I read it from the RECORD:

> I am free to admit for one that these enactments were passed at a period so different from the present that probably we can without serious harm in any direction muster them out, as we mustered out of service the victorious armies when the war was done. For myself, I see no serious practical objection to letting these sections go, &c.

On the 4th day of March last the gentleman from Ohio thought these amendments were harmless and might well be "mustered out," but on last Saturday he pictured in frightful colors the dark and damning treason that was nursed in our effort here to place a clause repealing them in this appropriation bill. How shall we ever know what may please the gentleman from Ohio. On the 4th day of March he is in favor of just such a method of legislation as we are seeking to enact. On last Saturday he seems desirous of sending every man to perdition who is in favor of provisions similar to those which he advocated in March last. If he speaks again to these amendments I hope he will explain to us why it is not revolutionary to coerce the repeal of these sections by inserting them in the Army bill on March 4 last, but that it is revolutionary to do so in less than one month thereafter—on the 29th day of the same month. Has he received a different revelation on the latter date?

In 1872 he said it was revolution to defeat the will of the majority of the people of this country as expressed in Congress. Now the gentleman tells us that it is revolution if we do not yield to the dictation and dominance of the minority in Congress. The trouble with him I apprehend is this: for eighteen years he and his party have had control of the administration of this Government, and the pill is a bitter one for him to swallow now that he is compelled to train with the minority. He regards it revolutionary for the American people to put his party out of power. Doubtless it is from that fact he has drawn his idea of revolution.

Mr. Chairman, the corner-stone on which our political institutions rest is that the minority shall yield to the will of the majority in the government of this country. The gentleman from Ohio has time and again charged that it was the refusal of the South in 1860 to yield to the will of the majority as expressed in the election of the President which constituted treason and rebellion. He now puts himself on the same ground, and defiantly tells us his party will not yield to the will of the majority in the adoption of these amendments, "not even to save the Government from death by starvation." He anathematizes the southern Representatives of 1860 because they "threatened to shoot the Union to death" rather than yield to the will of the majority. Now that gentleman and those who occupy seats on the other side of this Chamber take up the rôle played by the South and threaten to starve the Union to death rather than yield to the majority. Well, sir, the South did not shoot the Union to death, and I apprehend the republican party will not succeed in "starving this Union to death," nor defeat again the sovereign will of a majority of the people of this land.

The gentleman I think came much nearer the true position in 1872 than he does now when he said that a factious opposition to the will of the majority in this Government was revolutionary in its nature, would put an end to "parliamentary government in this country, and would inflict a serious if not a fatal wound upon the freedom and efficiency of national legislation."

Mr. Chairman, there never was in my district a Federal supervisor of elections or a deputy United States marshal at the polls on the day of election. We have never had a United States soldier in my district for the purpose of keeping the peace at the polls. Therefore my course to-day is not dictated by any personal grievance of my own or of my constituents. But, sir, when I remember events which have occurred at the polls in many other districts, and find that the laws which we seek to repeal have given the party in power the privilege of surrounding the polls with its recruiting sergeants, who have been paid for their partisan work out of taxes wrung from the whole people; when I remember that party has in Southern States influenced and carried elections by the use of troops at the polls; and when I know that most of this political machinery can be applied to intimidate, overawe, and rob suffragists of their rights at the ballot-box in my own as well as all other districts, as a faithful representative of the people I cannot hesitate to enter my protest against these tyrannical enactments and cast my vote in favor of their repeal.

From the foundation of the Government down to the year 1865 no law had found its way on the statute-book recognizing the use of troops at the polls in their capacity as soldiers; and until 1872 no law in this country authorized the employment of supervisors to oversee the voters, or deputy marshals to manipulate them in the interest of any political party. Until that period elections in this country were free, and the American citizen proceeded to the ballot-box not as a bondman but as a sovereign, uninfluenced by fear and without the restraint of overseers. Then, sir, the voice of the people was heard and ruled the land. Then the ballot "executed the freeman's will, as lightning executes the will of God."

What has resulted from this system of laws enacted to perpetuate the supremacy of the republican party? I have not the time to discuss the details in regard to districts which have been wrongfully taken from the democracy by these Federal officials at Saint Louis, Chicago, Cincinnati, and elsewhere, but will confine myself to occurrences in the southern district of New York. Most of the facts I gather from the investigations of a committee of this House in the last Congress. The republicans selected as the chief supervisor John I. Davenport, a man as cruel and unscrupulous as he was cunning. In order to accomplish his shameful work at the election in last November he was provided, by virtue of these laws, with nearly two thousand seven hundred deputy marshals and supervisors, at a cost to the people of about $60,000. He was also provided with an iron cage or den to imprison his victims. Now see how he performed his cruel work. On the night before the election, upon the affidavit of his own clerk, he issued warrants on which four thousand freemen, citizens of New York, were arrested on election day while they were on their way to deposit their ballots. Those who refused or could not give bond that they would not vote were held in confinement until after sundown and the polls were closed, when the prison door was thrown open and all set at liberty. All these cases were dismissed in court as being irregular, and only one single case, that of Peter Coleman, ever went to trial. It was heard before Judge Blatchford, an able and upright Federal judge, of republican politics. He decided that the arrest was illegal and unjustifiable, and of course the prisoner was set at liberty, but not until after he had been degraded and vilely outraged for daring to exercise the right of suffrage so dear to every patriotic heart in America; not until he had been robbed of his freedom and his party of his vote.

Facts like these have awakened in my mind the fear that if they can commit such outrages on the ballot-box in other localities the day may not be far off in the future when they may put their unhallowed hands on the ballot-boxes in my own district. What is the issue which we make with these gentlemen? We simply demand that the way to the ballot-box shall be kept open for all entitled to the elective franchise. No man in this land shall be compelled to submit his cause to any but an impartial jury. We stand to-day on the same ground that our fathers have occupied before us. We are not introducing revolutionary ideas and methods in this Government, but we are returning to the fundamental principles of the Republic. Monarchical England more jealously guarded the polls from military interference than the republican party has done during its reign of terror. For over a hundred years a statute has existed in England prohibiting any soldier from going out of his barracks on election day at any point within two miles of any city, town, or borough where an election is held except for the purpose of casting his vote, and then requiring him to return with all convenient speed to his barracks. What a humiliating spectacle is presented to the world. The election of members of Parliament is more securely guarded from the influence of the military power in the monarchy of England than in the Republic of America; and a great political party exists in this country who threaten the destruction of the Government rather than surrender the use of bayonets at the polls. Sir, these laws are not the enactments of freedom, but they are the decrees of despotism. These are not the first tyrannical laws which have been placed on our statute-books. The laws we propose to repeal are of the same nature as the alien and sedition laws enacted under the administration of John Adams. What was the condition of things when the democratic party came into power under the administration of Thomas Jefferson? What did it do with the alien and sedition laws which the old Federal party had placed upon the statute-book? Did the democratic party of that day say "Hush; do not disturb these laws or you may disturb the business interests of the country?" No. Jefferson and Madison and the democratic party affirmed that this is the land of the free; and these enactments being adopted only for a tyrannical form of government, without pausing to inquire whether money lords desired their repeal or not, in the interest of constitutional liberty, in the interest of freedom, they demanded that they should be annulled, and they were wiped from the statute-book. Shall we who profess attachment to Jeffersonian democracy and the principles of the men of '76 be intimidated by the absurd cry of revolution and the fears of an executive veto? If we be true men we shall courageously, unfalteringly discharge the solemn duty imposed upon us, and let our masters in a free election pass judgment upon us for vindicating the right of suffrage.

Mr. Chairman, I say again that I do not believe the President will veto these bills for any such reasons as those mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio. Why, sir, there is no provision of the Constitution more clearly understood than the one that the sole power to legislate in this country for the National Government belongs to Congress and that the President can have no share in framing legislation. If the President may shape our legislation, his title should change to that of dictator. The only power possessed by the President with regard to legislation is negative. He can only veto the bills of Congress, and then the power remains with Congress to coerce, if you please, the will of the President by making them law, his veto to the contrary notwithstanding. The language of the Constitution is plain: "Congress shall have power to make all laws," &c., (section 8, article 1.) The laws must emanate from Congress, and any man who rises in his place here and declares before the country that the majority in Congress in seeking to shape legislation according to its judgment is guilty of revolution audaciously insults the intelligence of the American people.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] claimed, I believe, that he was representing the great West, and that the great West was opposed to this method of legislation. I want to tell the gentleman from Wisconsin that the trembling wires brought in this morning news from Illinois, which forms a very considerable portion of the West, giving an expression of the opinion of the people of a portion of that State as to the character of this legislation. In the municipal election which occurred yesterday in Chicago this very question was an issue at the polls. [Laughter on the republican side of the House.] Do not laugh, gentlemen, until you hear the facts more fully as proven by your own papers. During the canvass just closed there the Tribune, the Inter-Ocean, and other papers, and your principal speakers in that canvass, Leonard Swett, Mr. Storrs, and others, declared that this very issue which we have here to-day was before the people of Chicago and was involved in the election of yesterday, and voters were called upon to express their judgment upon that issue. Well, they did so yesterday at the polls in Chicago.

What has been the result? For the first time in twenty years a democrat was elected on yesterday mayor of the city of Chicago upon this "revolutionary" issue.

Mr. WEAVER. That is a greenback triumph. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That tells us what is the voice of the West. In conclusion let me say that the democratic party has perhaps never had and may never have an issue with its opponent of more importance than the one presented to-day. The democratic party is now standing upon the ground occupied by Jefferson, Madison, and Jackson; it is contending for the freedom of the ballot-box and honest and impartial juries. The position they occupy is that when an American citizen proceeds to exercise his right of suffrage he shall be permitted to do so unmolested by Federal officials and uninfluenced by the fear of Federal bayonets. We seek to guard the ballot-box from every form of fear and intimidation. We would draw around it a circle of freedom and warn every tyrannical invader who shall put his unhallowed feet within its sacred precincts that he does so at his peril, be he one who wears the badge of a deputy marshal or one who carries a Federal bayonet.

As I have before expressed myself I believe that the Government can be maintained and perpetuated without the use of Federal bayonets against its own people. I believe that the safety of this Government rests more securely in the intelligence and virtue of the American people than upon bayonets. I believe with Cardinal Richelieu, that you should take away the sword, "States can be saved without it."

I yield the remainder of my time to my friend from New York, [Mr. LOUNSBERY.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BARBER. I desire to say a few words in reply to what has been said by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] concerning the election in Chicago.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have yielded the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LOUNSBERY.]

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Mr. Chairman, the great effort of the opposition has been to avoid the merits of the pending bill. An ingenious criticism of the method of adopting the repeal of the objectionable clause in the present law has been made. A labored research has brought to light facts upon which to indict a section of the country. The bloody shirt and the hate which antedated the war and which is yet so much the pabulum of partisan debate have been, as it seems to me, made too prominent in the discussion. The phantom of a presidential veto has also been held up to alarm the timid. All these considerations are foreign from the issue. They can have no legitimate place in the discussion.

The method is a mere question of practice, which is always subject to conditions, and must yield to principles which are vital and enduring. The question of a veto is a subject which belongs to an independent branch of the Government, and it should not influence our action here. It carries with it grave responsibilities, which are to be managed not in a spirit of partisanship, but with intelligence, patriotism, and moderation. The issues which antedated the war and the spirit of hate and recrimination which were a part of it, should now be relegated to the period to which they belong in history. The present subject should be considered from the stand-point of completed pacification in all the States now constituting our country.

What evils, let me ask my republican friends on the other side of the House, are likely to result from the repeal? Let us have the whole catalogue of ills.

The gentleman from Maine regrets the departure from this House of the colored men that once occupied seats on his side as Representatives of Southern States. The "solid South" is an evil that has come upon you during the operation of the law, and it is not the result of repeal. Speeches in this House of the sectional character of that of the gentleman from Maine are well calculated to confine republican successes to a small part of the country.

Mr. Chairman, it is not unfrequent in my district that the peace is broken at an election poll. Within the present month this happened at a poll next adjoining the city in which I live, and blood was shed. The feeling as to local matters in the town were in that condition of intense excitement that sagacious men for a week beforehand predicted the event. Yet I think I can safely say that none of the parties interested in that election would have deemed it else than a public outrage had Federal troops been called in to prevent or suppress the disturbance. It is a fact, I believe, that there has not been present in my district, either before or since the enactment of the law as it now stands, a single armed soldier of the Federal Army to prevent or suppress disturbance, and I think I can say for myself and for each of my colleagues from the State of New York on either side of this House, that if it were now an original question, disconnected from party exigency, we would find no call for the adoption of a law as applicable to our State, providing for the use of the Federal Army to keep the peace at election polls.

In assuming this I lay out of the question all notion of State rights. I will not rest upon any sentiment of State pride that we are able to police and regulate our own sovereign domain. But I put the question upon the menace that by common consent is to be implied from the use of armed troops at the polls—a feeling not common to this country but which we take from our English ancestors as well.

Let me quote on this subject from the first volume of Blackstone's Commentaries, page 178:

> And as it is essential to the very being of Parliament that elections should be absolutely free, therefore all undue influences upon the electors are illegal and strongly prohibited. * * * As soon, therefore, as the time and place of election, either in counties or boroughs, are fixed, all soldiers quartered in the place are to remove at least one day before the election to the distance of two miles or more; and not to return till one day after the election is ended.

This idea is fully recognized by elementary writers in this country. McCrary, in his American Law of Elections, at section 418, says:

> There can, however, be no doubt but that the law looks with great disfavor upon anything like an interference by the military with the freedom of an election. An armed force in the neighborhood of the polls is almost of necessity a menace to the voters and an interference with their freedom and independence, and if such armed force be in the hands of or under the control of the partisan friends of any particular candidate, the probability of improper influence becomes still stronger.

He then quotes the case of Giddings vs. Clark, a contested case in the Forty-second Congress:

> On the day of election the town where the election was held was occupied by an armed force under command of one Captain Richardson. Pickets were stationed on all the roads leading into the town, and persons coming in to vote were obliged to obtain a pass from the military authorities. Although the witnesses say that all voters were permitted to come and go in peace, and that the freedmen were urged to vote, yet it is clear that they abstained from doing so for reasons which most men considered good and sufficient.
> The committee of the House reported the opinion that this was not a free and fair election, and that it was no answer to say that the military were stationed around the polls to preserve the peace and to secure freedom to all voters.

McCrary cites this English case:

> As early as 1741 an attempt was made to interfere with an election held for the city of Westminster, by stationing a body of armed soldiers near the polls. On this being shown to the House of Commons, it was by that body resolved that the presence of a regular body of armed soldiers at an election of members to serve in Parliament is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of this kingdom.

I am aware that there has lately been a political crisis in France. It was demanded of President McMahon that he should remove the commanding general of the army to be replaced by one whose political views conformed to the advanced republicanism of the National Assembly. McMahon was unwilling to yield to such demand and resigned his office. I may be permitted to express a doubt as to the solid hold of the now prevailing party upon the free will of the French people if their power is depending upon the favor of the army; and addressing myself to the other side of this House, I would ask if their anxiety upon this question is not imported from the situation in France? The gentleman from Ohio who opened the debate on that side (and is followed in the same style by others) has uttered the most gloomy predictions of the future to this country from the adoption of the amendment now pending in the committee.

It is styled a revolutionary measure. It will starve out the life of the country, it is said. It is the picture of our ship of state drifting upon breakers and to sure destruction:

> Then shrieked the timid, and stood still the brave.

This unbroken howl of despair which comes up from the other side, is but the utterance of the idea of the French Assembly. They must have the Army at the polls. Party needs are such that they cannot part with coercion. They call upon the executive branch of Government to intervene to save the last remnant of departing power.

The violent opposition on this floor to the repeal of the objectionable words of the law as it now stands, as now exhibited, is a danger and a menace from which it is not too soon to secure the country.

Mr. Chairman, I am indulging for myself no such gloomy expectations as are foreshadowed by the opposition. I am not expecting, as I have no interest in urging, a veto of the pending bill. I may safely advance a compliment to the intelligence of the Executive. There can be made no constitutional objection to the bill. The right of Congress to regulate the use of the Army is clearly expressed in the Constitution. This right was exercised without question upon the passage of the law in 1865, upon which this amendment is to be ingrafted.

He can find no difficulty with the question as a measure of policy. If he be not governed by the precedents to which I have referred, why should he not heed the congressional majority, lately from the people, whose will it was chosen to represent? If he yield to the claims of the situation as presented to him by his party friends and use his power to retain for party use this element of coercion, this menace to free election, the people will assert that will which is the supreme law in a popular government; will assert it not by revolutionary or irregular methods, but by that decisive volume of expression at the polls which will render coercion and fraudulent counting entirely out of the question to change or modify the result.

What the people demand of this Congress and of each branch of this Government is the right to express their wishes in an election freely and without coercion, "unbribed by favor and unawed by power."

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, ever since I have been a member of this body, and so long as I shall remain a member of it, whether it be for a longer or a shorter period, I shall continue to point out what I conceive to be a very grave error and a very great danger enacted into the rules of this House by the change of Rule 120. And those who served with me in the last Congress will bear me out in the statement that I never failed on every occasion to point out what I conceived to be the very grave error which this House fell into by allowing that change.

We are to day indebted for this extra session of Congress and for this debate as the consequence of the change of that rule. I know that I speak not only the sentiments of a large portion of this side of the Chamber, but of many of my democratic friends, who have often said that the change of Rule 120 has placed in the hands of one committee of this House practically all the legislation of the country. I hope to see the day, not very far distant, when you on that side of the House as well as we on this shall distribute the powers of this House to the different committees where they belong.

Until this rule was changed there never was any question as to the impropriety of placing legislation of this sort upon an appropriation bill. I premise my remarks with this statement.

In the next place, I desire to say that this side of the Chamber must not be and cannot be driven from the position they occupy by the menace and threat contained in this sort of legislation. That it may be understood and understood properly, and that we may not drift too far from the point under discussion, I desire to call back the attention of the House to the precise point which has given rise to this discussion. What is it? It is a section incorporated in this appropriation bill proposing to amend a certain section of the law as it now stands upon the statute-book by striking out of it the simple words "to keep the peace at the polls," applying to the Army of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, we have been enlightened and entertained by learned constitutional disquisitions as to what power Government possesses as regards this class of legislation. I say, disguise it as you may, cover it as deeply as you choose with these learned dissertations on constitutional power, the great question lying behind it all is the question which has agitated this country ever since it was formed; that is the question of State sovereignty and State rights. Behind all this discussion lies that vexed question. One would almost be ready to say that written constitutions are a failure; for out of the debates upon the true construction of the Constitution came the war that recently shook the country from center to circumference; and I doubt not that many gentlemen on the other side who voluntarily withdrew from the Union did so honestly, believing that they had a right to do so under the Constitution; but while I admit this as a truth, I abhor your conclusion. These constant debates and turmoils as to the powers of the Government under the Constitution almost lead one to believe that all written constitutions for the government of a country are a failure.

Mr. Chairman, in all the debates that have taken place during the last century in the English Parliament there has been scarcely a division of opinion as to the rights, the duties, and the powers of that branch of the government under their constitution. But here in America, where we had supposed the wisdom of the fathers had framed a Constitution containing everything that was necessary for the government of the people, there have been constant wrangles and menaces. Mr. Chairman, after I had followed the flag in a very humble capacity for four years and a half, I had supposed that this old question of State rights or State sovereignty was settled with slavery and with it would forever lie covered in its bloody grave. But here on every occasion we have thrust into the debates the assertion that the republican party or Congress in one way or another has been encroaching on the rights of the States, and we are compelled to listen to the outcry of centralization and the "man on horseback" and such chimerical assertions.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the best way in the world to secure the repeal of an odious law is to enforce it. There never was a truer aphorism than this expression of General Grant. The people are sensitive upon all these questions. Let an odious law be passed, and when you undertake to enforce it, the people will very quickly instruct their Representatives as to their will.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss for a moment or two the constitutional power of Congress over this question; and I premise by saying that for one as a republican, but speaking alone for myself, I do not care one farthing whether this proposed amendment as an independent piece of legislation is passed or not. As a mere question of policy it is wholly immaterial to me whether the law be changed in this respect. But I do care as to the manner in which the existing provision is sought to be removed from the statute-book; and if it is to be repealed or amended, I want to guard carefully what I conceive to be the constitutional right of the Government to make and enforce such legislation.

Shakspeare portrays human nature well in the sentence—

What, upon compulsion! No; were I at the strappado, or all the racks in the world, I would not tell you on compulsion.

I must not be told that I shall yield a constitutional right, although the measure sought to be enacted is obsolete.

As to the necessity of legislation of this kind I say to the gentlemen of the South, of all men in the world you ought not to complain of the law on this subject. In every Southern State you have a democratic governor and a democratic Legislature in sympathy with the party represented on your side of the House. It is conceded on all hands that troops cannot be used at the polls in elections except upon the call of the State Legislature, or the governor if the Legislature cannot be convened. Hence it seems to me to be a barren effort for gentlemen of the South to undertake to raise this momentous issue upon such a question.

As to the constitutional power of the Government to pass legislation of this kind, two gentlemen upon the other side have announced themselves clearly. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] referred to article 1, section 4, of the Constitution, which is in this language:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Discussing this provision, the gentleman from Ohio declared that its manifest and true construction is that in the event of the people of the State failing to make provision on these subjects, Congress in the exercise of its power may do so. To that position I cannot assent. Under that provision of the Constitution it is just as much the right of Congress to regulate the time, the place, and the manner (which covers all) of electing Representatives, as it is the right of the State Legislature. There is a concurrent jurisdiction or power with a reserved right in Congress to override State laws whenever it chooses to exercise that power. In concluding his argument on this point the gentleman from Ohio says:

Therefore, is not the conclusion inevitable and irresistible that any legislation upon this subject is unconstitutional?

Now, can anybody afford to plant himself upon such a position and maintain the results which must follow in the path of this legislation? If the law is unconstitutional, then it protects nobody. Who attempts to enforce it? When the Legislature of a State passes an unconstitutional law and the courts undertake to execute it, the sheriff, when attempting to enforce that unconstitutional act, becomes a trespasser and cannot justify his action, though he holds in his hand the writ of the court. So, if this legislation is unconstitutional, the President has no right to execute it, and any attempt on his part to do so makes him a trespasser. This is the deduction, the only deduction, which follows the position taken by the learned gentleman from Ohio. But the able gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] was more careful in his position. His distinction is that of a lawyer, clear and well defined, but I think entirely too technical. I believe his distinction is a distinction without a difference, as I shall soon have occasion to show.

The gentleman from Kentucky, when interrogated upon this question by the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] remarked that if the President was properly called upon to send troops to a voting place to suppress domestic violence or "mob law," as he called it, he had no doubt of the constitutional duty of the President to send troops to such voting place. Here is the language which the gentleman used:

If the application is made in regular form under the act of Congress, I admit that it is the duty of the President to send troops, but I say when troops have gone into a State and have dispersed the mobs or insurrectionists or whoever is acting in resistance to the State authorities, they have performed their duty and must stop. They cannot remain at the election precincts to keep the peace, or, in other words, to prevent outbreaks of violence.

Now, the distinction clearly drawn by the gentleman from Kentucky is this, that domestic violence and the breaking of the peace are not necessarily one and the same thing. But upon that basis I combat his position by saying that any breach of the peace, no matter how small or how great, is domestic violence. It is true that a breach of the peace may not require the intervention of the troops to quell it, but it is nevertheless within the meaning of the constitutional provision denominated "domestic violence."

How would the position assumed by the gentleman from Kentucky leave us? Let me depict by way of illustration the effect. It is not always the best way of arguing a question, for illustrations are regarded by logicians often as illusory and not good logic, but sometimes illustrations present a question fully to the view. Therefore, let me by way of illustration present the position of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky. At a voting precinct domestic violence breaks out, and the President is called upon properly to send troops to suppress it, and he does send troops, and the mob overawed by the presence of the troops cease their violence, but stand revolver in hand, with torch lighted, but in peace, overawed for the time being by the presence of the troops. The gentleman says the moment they become peaceable—that is, quiet and not engaged in rioting—that moment the troops must go away. Such a construction simply defeats the purpose for which the provision was intended. As an incident to the power, the Army cannot only be called out to suppress domestic violence, but it can be kept there, as I interpret the language of the Constitution, so long as it is necessary to preserve the peace.

This leads me now to the next proposition which I desire to discuss. It was ably discussed by my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] and I do not know but that I would do well to leave it as he put it. The restatement of the proposition, however, can do no harm. In all governments there must be a coercive force somewhere. A government without power to coerce obedience to its laws and mandates is no government at all; it is a mere sham and fraud. As has been well said by my friend, in the courts of the States is lodged primary power to execute the laws by and through ministerial officers; when they fail they call upon the posse comitatus, and, if that is not sufficient, then upon the militia. The same theory is true with United States courts; first the marshals, then the posse comitatus, and then the Army of the United States. All these are coercive powers placed in the hands of governments for the purpose of protecting themselves and their citizens. Without them, as I have said, governments would be shams and frauds.

Now I go further than that. I take the position—and I take it for myself, and I bind no party but myself—I take the position that in every case where the State refuses or fails or neglects to protect fully the citizen of that State in all of his rights it is the right of that citizen to call upon his Government to be protected, and the bounden duty of the Government to protect him. Why, Mr. Chairman, if one of the aliens from Germany, or England, or Ireland, who comes to this country and swears allegiance to its flag, should return to the country of his birth, and that government should dare molest him, the whole power of our Government would be invoked for his protection, and rightfully. And do gentlemen on the other side say that in that instance against a foreign government there is a constitutional right of the adopted citizen to be protected, while in the case of the native citizen, when his State refuses to protect him, the arm of the Government falls powerless? It is a position with which I am at war, and shall remain so until in this country of ours, wherever an American citizen may be he may call, and not call in vain, for the protection of all of his rights.

I shall now content myself, Mr. Chairman, with a criticism upon the bill and its effects, and then my speech is done. I do not like to enter into criticism until amendments are in order, but as I do not propose to offer any amendments to this bill I will call the attention of the House and the country to its effects if it should pass.

It provides that "every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

Now suppose on election day it is absolutely necessary troops be sent off to some other place and they pass by the polls in the nearest way en route. If that law is strictly construed, the officer in command of those troops must go to the penitentiary; there is no help for it, no escape from it; and if he disobeys his commanding officer and refuses to go, he is guilty of disobedience of orders and must be instantly dismissed the service—a fine species of legislation for the American Congress!

But I do not care to enter into a discussion as to the effect particularly upon the officers. I want, however, to call attention to one effect that this stoppage of legislation will have upon the country, which I believe has not yet been adverted to. Now, I do not speak for the President of the United States. I have no power to speak for him, and I do not know what he will do. Nor do I believe any man knows what he will do with reference to approving or vetoing the bill if it should pass; for if there is anything the present President of the United States is celebrated for it is for keeping his own counsel, and no man can find out what he is going to do. But this, Mr. Chairman, I do know: I do know that all legislation is vested in the two Houses of Congress, subject, nevertheless, to the constitutional limitation of a veto by the President. I do know that he will act strictly within the provisions of the Constitution, if his objection to this bill shall be such that he feels compelled to veto it and does so.

In which event all of us and the country will find out in a short time that if contraction has taken place heretofore and injuriously affected the country, as claimed, it will be increased by reason of the stoppage of the wheels of the Government; for if the officers of the Government shall consent to serve without pay, the money will be paid into the United States Treasury at the rate of $150,000,000 every six months, but there will not be any way by which you can pay it out; so that in the course of a year you will have locked up in the Treasury of the United States something like $300,000,000, without any authority to pay it out. And if the country has been suffering by contraction hitherto, what will take place under such a state of affairs?

Now, as to the responsibility, and where it belongs, I think I need argue with no man that if the President shall, acting under the Constitution, and as he believes it his duty, veto this measure, and the democrats on this floor shall say that unless he shall consent against his will to allow a measure to which he cannot assent to become a law they will stop the wheels of Government, there can be no question that the responsibitity will rest with them and not with us. I make the further remark that I know if you could surrender or if we on this side of the House could surrender pride of opinion long enough to be statesmen and not partisans, in one day the bills under consideration could be passed and we could go home.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it was once remarked by one of the ablest jurists that I have ever had the honor to appear before, to one of the humblest of the profession, "I had occasion yesterday to rule against you, but this morning, after having considered the question again, I believe you were right and I was wrong and I have no pride of opinion." That principle should permeate the breast of every member of Congress; the question should not be, in my humble judgment, how this will advance the interests of the republican party or how that will advance the interests of the democratic party, or of the greenback party, if you please; but what is right? What ought I to do? And whenever that principle takes possession of members of Congress and we advance out from beneath the shadow of partisanship on to the broad plane of statesmanship we shall pass these bills speedily and without delay. The country will then be happy, and the conviction of having done right ought at least to make us happy.

Mr. HERBERT rose.

Mr. CALKINS. How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CALKINS. I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. WHITE. I will yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] now, and will follow him, if that arrangement can be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can have his time at the expiration of the next hour.

Mr. WHITE. Very well.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Chairman, we have passed over every item of appropriation on this bill. Some of these items have been passed after discussion, some without any discussion at all. On these items the minority on this floor is willing to submit to the majority, but when we come to the clause that prohibits troops at the polls they say that clause shall not become the law, at least in this bill. And the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who spoke on last Saturday, the leader on his side of the House, enforced this declaration by saying that it should not pass, not even to save this Government.

Sir, who gave the gentleman the power to make that threat, to use that bold language to the majority on this floor? I know very well he got his authority from a republican caucus. But who gave to that caucus the right to authorize him to dictate to the majority on this floor? When the gentleman was himself in the majority, when he was backed by the power to make good his words, he had the right, because he was backed by the power to use such language. He seems to forget that the people of the United States in the last election have left him and his party in both Houses of this Congress in the minority. He takes his stand here, however, not on the substance of this bill, but really on a question of form. He told us in his speech on Saturday that he would not discuss the amendment as it was called, or the special legislation on this bill, because he considered it unimportant. On yesterday he rose in his seat and said that if that measure was proposed as a separate measure he would vote for it.

But, sir, he said we should not combine two measures. Had the gentleman a right to speak those words to this House, representing as he does the minority, or is he the lord chancellor, the keeper of the President's conscience, and has the President authorized him to speak here in his behalf those words of menace to this House? I know President Hayes, and I do not believe that he has ever at any time so far outstepped the limits of official propriety and duty as to lend himself to be used in any such manner. It would not only be against propriety, but against decency as well, and I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an extract which I have marked from a report made by John Quincy Adams in the year 1842 as to the duty of the President and members of this body on occasions of this kind.

The Clerk read as follows:

Until a very recent period of our history, all reference in either House of Congress to the opinions or wishes of the President relating to any subject in deliberation before them was regarded as an outrage upon the rights of the deliberative body, among the first of whose duties it is to spurn the influence of the dispenser of patronage and power. Until very recently, it was sufficient greatly to impair the influence of any member to be suspected of personal subserviency to the Executive; and any allusion to his wishes in debate was deemed a departure not less from decency than from order.

Mr. DUNNELL. From what has the Clerk read?

Mr. HERBERT. From the report made to the House by John Quincy Adams in 1842 in relation to a veto by President Tyler.

The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] the next, I believe, on the republican side who followed in this discussion, saw proper to reiterate the threat of the gentleman from Ohio. We have had it again this morning uttered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] Sir, if these gentlemen did have the authority to represent the President, and did represent him in making these threats to influence legislation in this House, in what position would they put him?

The legislative power of the United States is vested by the Constitution in these two Houses, and we must look to that Constitution as the source of power and authority.

The English constitution, which has sometimes been alluded to in this debate, furnishes no analogy whatever, for there, practically, a conflict never can arise between the Crown and Parliament. The Crown has the right, the absolute right, of veto, theoretically; but that right has not been exercised for the past one hundred and fifty years. Practically it is a nullity. Whatever the Parliament passes the Crown approves, so sensitive is the Queen of England to the wishes of her subjects as expressed by the legislative body of the realm. It is also the rule in Great Britain that whenever, on a vote of want of confidence, the administration finds itself unable to carry any measure through Parliament, that very instant a dissolution of the administration occurs, and a new set of officers is put in power more in harmony with the will of the people as expressed by Parliament. But in this representative Government of ours we see the leaders of a party in which the people at the last election voted a want of confidence rising in their places and threatening us, the majority in this Congress, that if we do not put bills in the shape to suit them, if we do not separate and divide as they dictate, then this Government shall stop; that the President by his veto will starve it to death.

Sir, if such a conflict should occur it would indeed present a singular spectacle to an Englishman who has been accustomed to look upon this Government as a government of the people. But looking at the question from our stand-point, looking to the Constitution of the United States, what do we find? In the first place, it is a rule of constitutional construction, applied as well to the Constitution of the United States as to the constitution of the States, that wherever legislative power is granted without restriction there inheres necessarily in the legislative body to which the grant is made the right to make its own rules and legislate in its own manner upon any and every subject over which its power may extend. That is the universal rule of construction.

In some of the States of this Union it has been deemed by the people that that power ought to be inhibited to a certain extent; that new limitations ought to be placed upon the power to legislate. For instance, that a Legislature ought not to combine different measures in the same bill. Therefore we find that in my own State, the State of Alabama, in the new constitution adopted since the close of the war, there is a provision that every bill shall contain only one subject, which shall be expressed in the caption or title of the act.

So it is in the constitution of the State of the gentleman from Ohio. In 1851 that same amendment was put in its constitution, and a new inhibition placed upon the power of the Legislature.

Now, why was this? It was because the people, the source of power, saw proper to put that new provision in that constitution as they have done in Alabama. Before the constitution of 1851 in Ohio the Legislature of that State had, as this Congress has, the right to combine as many measures in one bill as it saw proper. If the people of Ohio took away that power from the Legislature of Ohio it was an indication of their will, and it must be observed.

If in the Constitution of the United States the general power of legislation, according to its own rules, not prescribed by the President, not prescribed by any authority whatever, is still left to the Congress of the United States—to us, the Representatives of the people, to be used for the benefit of the people—does it not follow, as day follows night, that the people approve of our legislating as we please in that respect?

Again, some State constitutions, as the constitution of my own State, contain a provision that the governor may veto, if he sees proper, any one item of an appropriation bill. No such amendment has ever been made to the Constitution of the United States, and therefore it is that no such power exists in the President of the United States. Full power is still left with us, as it has been for nearly a century, to combine as we see proper just as many provisions in a bill as in our opinion the wants of the public demand.

Gentlemen talk about coercing the will of the President. If we look to the Constitution, which in so many words vests all legislative power in the two Houses of Congress, we will find that the President is not made a part of the legislative power of this Government. He does have the power of veto; there is no doubt about that, and we do not deny that he has that power; but in how many cases, when bills go to him, does he sign them and aid in passing them into laws, when they contain provisions which if presented separately he would not approve? Take, for instance, the last river and harbor appropriation bill. That contains appropriations for many different rivers and harbors all over the United States. In that bill there was a provision for the benefit of my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WHITE,] who proposes to answer me; a provision for the Kiskiminetas. Does any man believe that if that Kiskiminetas appropriation had been sent to the President as a separate and independent measure he would have approved it? Yet that gentleman, when he comes to answer me, I suppose will say that if any bill whatever is presented to the President of the United States containing any provision which he does not approve, it will be his duty to refuse his approval of the bill even if the result shall be the starving of the Government to death.

Not only does this power which we are now exercising inhere in us by the Constitution of the United States, but it has been exercised for many years past. I have not undertaken to examine the records of these transactions any farther back than the time when the republican party came into full power in the United States. I have made a search among the appropriation bills passed from 1861 to 1875, while that party was in full power. I want to show how these lovers of fair legislation, these sticklers for form, these gentlemen so much devoted to the voluntary assent or dissent of the President, managed these matters while they were in control. I have only taken note of a few of the bills, but I have memoranda enough with reference to the volumes and pages to show that no republican Congress ever did adjourn from this Capitol without having done, time and again, precisely the thing they condemn with so much vehemence now. I mean, put new legislation on bills of appropriation. It was all right when they did it, of course, but it is all wrong now. I send the list to the Clerk's desk and ask him to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HERBERT. I will not attempt to comment on that table; it speaks for itself. I asked the question a while ago, In what situation would the President of the United States be if his views were the same as those of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD?] In what situation would that gentleman place the President of the United States when he called upon him to veto this bill? In the first place, the honorable gentleman says that he himself does not object to and is willing to vote for this provision in relation to troops at the polls if it is introduced as a separate measure. And, as a matter of course, he is also willing, though he has not said so, but I take it for granted that he does not want to starve the Government to death—he is also willing to vote for the appropriations in this bill. Then he is in this condition, and says to us, If you will separate these two measures I will vote for each of them; but if you put the two in one bill, then I hold that it is the duty of the President to veto them both. According to this gentleman, the President must take his stand upon a parliamentary punctilio and starve the Government to death. He must claim the right to dictate to us how many good measures we must combine in our bills or what we must leave out of our bills or he must let the Government slide and chaos come again. That is the position, that is the situation which the gentleman occupies.

No wonder that the honorable gentleman from Ohio said in his speech on Saturday that he felt constrained by the necessities of the situation to allude to the withdrawal of the southern members from this floor in 1861 and the war that followed. No wonder that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] who followed him felt also compelled by the necessities of the situation to dig out of the dead past the memory of Anthony Burns and the riot that occurred in Boston. No wonder that the gentleman from Wisconsin, who spoke this morning, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] also followed in the same footsteps. I tell you, gentlemen, the situation is necessitous when you feel compelled to cover up the issue that we present to the people of the United States by the bloody shirt wielded by your stalwart arms. But you shall not do it. You run away from the point, flaunting the red flag, and expect us to follow you like a set of mad bulls. But we will not do it. We hold you to the issue presented by this bill.

The plain, simple question is: Shall troops of the United States interfere with voters at the polls? That is the question, and that is the issue to which we hold you. We have nothing to do now with the war; that is passed forever. Much as you may regret it, secession is dead, the war is over, and the Union is restored—it is indissoluble. The States are equal, and their Representatives are here in this branch of Congress and in the other branch, coming from all over the Union, each with equal power and authority.

The gentleman from Maine felt further compelled by the necessities of the situation to lug into his argument a foolish editorial, written by some northern man down in the State of Mississippi who represents nobody but himself. Gentlemen, you cannot dodge in that way the issue made in this bill, and you cannot make this a sectional question. The question presented is plain, whether or not the military is subordinate to the civil power; whether the soldier is superior to the voter at the polls. That is the question you must meet before the people, provided you take the responsibility of doing so. It is utterly vain for you to try to make out that the democratic party is a sectional party. I know that you would have it so if you could, but you know it is not so. It is utterly vain for you to undertake to maintain that the issues now presented on these bills and claiming the consideration of Congress are sectional issues. Of the three propositions in question, but one came from a southern man. That was a provision in relation to jurors, and it was so palpably and manifestly fair that several republicans on this floor—four, I believe, from the State of Massachusetts—voted for it. Do you call that a "revolutionary" proposition—a proposition which republicans voted for? Certainly not.

Another proposition, the one in relation to supervisors of election, came from a Representative from the State of Ohio—a State that now has eleven democratic Representatives on this floor—a State that has two hundred and fifty thousand democratic voters. The provision in relation to troops at the polls which we are now discussing was first suggested and urged by Hon. Mr. Hewitt, a Representative from the Empire State of the Union—a State that has three hundred and fifty thousand democratic voters to-day and has eleven democratic members on this floor. The democratic party in the North and West has to-day eight hundred thousand more democratic voters than there are in all the Southern States combined. In the name of the three million democratic voters scattered all over the Union, in the name of fair-minded liberty-loving people everywhere, in the name of the Constitution, in the name of the people we represent, we ask that this bill be passed into a law; and I, for one, do not believe that the President of the United States will deny it his approval.

I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PHISTER.]

Mr. KEIFER. Before the gentleman takes his seat I wish to ask him one question. He has spoken of the editor of the Okolona States as being an Ohio man. I want to know whether that man was not, on account of his ability and peculiar political views, invited by Colonel Harper, the owner of that paper, to come down there and edit it in the interest of the democratic party?

Mr. HERBERT. I do not know whether he was or not; I do not know anything about that matter; but if he was invited there, the good people of that country ought to invite him to leave.

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to say to the gentleman that the paper is reported to be taken more extensively than any other weekly paper in the State of Mississippi.

Mr. HERBERT. Does the gentleman know that such is the fact?

Mr. KEIFER. I know it is so stated by the paper itself.

Mr. HERBERT. I suppose that it is taken just as you take it; just as the New York Tribune takes it; and I should not be surprised if it should turn out that that paper is supported by republican money. It furnishes food for such papers as the New York Tribune and is no help to democracy.

Mr. KEIFER. Is not that paper owned by Colonel Harper, who was in the confederate army, and is he not running it and supervising it all the time now?

Mr. HERBERT. I have told the gentleman all that I know about the matter. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PHISTER.]

Mr. PHISTER. Mr. Chairman, it was the utterance of a celebrated European politician skilled in statecraft that language is intended to disguise meaning, not to express it. When Poland was overthrown and her people deprived of their independence it was proclaimed that "Order reigned in Warsaw." It was order arising from subjugation; it was the repose of despotism. After the coup d'état, when the republic was crushed in France and Louis Napoleon was firmly enthroned in power, with soldiers in the midst of and surrounding his capital and all the great cities, the press deprived of its freedom, the people awed into silent submission, and elections carried triumphantly in his favor by the quieting influence of the sword, he uttered his celebrated expression, "The empire is peace." It was the peace of military domination; a despairing recognition of the loss of liberty.

A distinguished ex-President of the United States closed one of his papers with the well-remembered invocation, "Let us have peace." It was a prelude to the further display of armed power, to the continued use of the soldiery of the country, not only in deciding but controlling elections, in raising up and putting down governors of States, seating and unseating Legislatures, and finally, after having the troops in a number of the States to terrorize the voters at the presidential election, in surrounding the capital while Congress was in session to prevent the real choice of the people for President from being counted in and inaugurated.

The Army of this country has thus been used, and all in the name of "peace."

In the light of these facts what are we to understand if a law is continued in force authorizing the Army under a specious pretense "to keep peace at the polls?"

It is inconsistent with republican institutions. An army means force; it is power. It is for war; it produces awe and terror, and its use ends in domination. Inter arma leges silent. When it has been used in the past for these purposes under the name of keeping the peace, we know what we have a right to expect in the future. We are approaching another presidential election and are on the eve of great political battles which may decide that contest. We find one great political party with unanimity here contending for the use of the Army at elections; they say to keep the peace at the polls. But the Lord instructed us to pray not to be led into temptation. And we feel, from our knowledge of the past and from the constitution of human nature, that if the law remains as it now is it will be a powerful temptation in the fierceness of party warfare to use the Army to illegitimately effect results.

The President is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and although he is not as "stalwart" as many of those who now, for party purposes of their own, desire to be considered the peculiar champions of his prerogatives, yet it is easy to foresee how, as heretofore, reports may be manufactured, pretexts invented, and actual occasions conveniently started with strife in order to get him to use the Army in the interests of their party at the polls. Good men are led astray by passion; parties are carried to excesses by prejudice; and it needs no power of prophecy to predict that if the use of the Army at the polls is legalized, when the great prize of the Presidency is at stake, with over one hundred thousand offices as its spoils, with hundreds of millions of treasure to handle, with the unabated political hate of our adversaries inspiring the movement, they desperate at the approaching loss entirely of their ill-used power, the Army will be thus used to intimidate and overawe the voters and control elections.

It is time this should cease. This is the afternoon of the nineteenth century. This is boasted of as the freest country on earth; and here and now it should be resolved that elections should be free and fair. The amendments to the Revised Statutes contained in the sixth section of this Army appropriation bill should be passed. But it is objected that they are made part of an appropriation bill. The act is entitled "A bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes." And it is proclaimed as revolutionary that a section is incorporated in that bill that the Army thus to be supported shall not be used at the polls "unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States." And, as prohibition without a penalty would amount to nothing, the proper punishment is provided for a violation of this section.

When the cunning politicians of ancient Rome had exhausted all other means to prevent some step or measure inimical to their ambition, they appealed to the weakest and most vulnerable characteristic of the people, their superstition, and had the soothsayers to say the signs were unpropitious, or in the last desperate emergency to exclaim that "it thundered." So our republican friends, overthrown before the people and driven to their last intrenchments, and knowing that the country is tired of strife and desires stability and peace, ring out the cry so alarming to business, "revolution," "revolution," against this legislation, hoping thus to arrest the tide of popular opinion that has been running against them and to repair their shattered fortunes.

But how ridiculous, if I may respectfully speak it, is the cry of revolution. Is it revolution to enact that the citizens shall vote unawed by the terror of bayonets? Is it revolution when the people's Representatives are voting supplies to the Army to provide that it shall not be used to cleave down their liberties; that the people's money thus voted shall not be used to undermine their free institutions? But it is absurdly charged that it is revolution to annex constitutional conditions to a bill supporting the Army. It is proclaimed with unwearied repetition that it is coercion of the President, and that it is revolutionary to coerce him. Who is empowered here to usurp the authority of the President and to speak for him? Who is authorized to say that he is so enamored of military power that he will regard it as an invasion of his prerogative to enact in the supply bill itself that the Army thus to be supported shall not be used in a manner inconsistent with our institutions? It seems to me the President would not be thankful to the indiscreet if not false friend who would put him in the unenviable attitude of regarding this as coercion. Are not such cries really disrespectful to him in being founded on the hope of stimulating a false pride in him, and thus of having him come to their relief in their desperation?

On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, soberly speaking, would it not be an attempt at revolution—revolution, not in the interest of liberty, but in the direction of despotism, for the Executive to veto a supply bill for the Army because it did not authorize him to use it to overawe and terrorize the citizens in the exercise of the elective franchise in the States? There is no constitutional inhibition against such a condition to a supply bill. If so dangerous, why not incorporated by our wise and far-seeing fathers in the Constitution? If this system of legislation had never been indulged in before, if our adversaries had never practiced it, we might now give them more credit for sincerity.

If this section of the bill is constitutional, it certainly cannot be revolutionary. The Constitution says:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The language is "Congress may" do it. It is not mandatory; it is discretionary. If Congress, in the exercise of this discretion, has heretofore unfortunately authorized the Army to be used at the polls in a manner which has improperly influenced elections, and is now satisfied that it has been injurious, and by a deliberately considered bill chooses to repeal such legislation and withdraw such power, how can the executive department of the Government complain, much less veto such repealing legislation?

As to the form of it, I, speaking for myself individually, would have preferred that these repealing measures should have been presented and enacted in separate bills. But as to the mode in which this is presented it is a mere parliamentary form of enactment, certainly within the parliamentary discretion of Congress; and it is the wildest stretch of imagination, prompted it must be by the despair of a dying political dynasty, to present the fair exercise of parliamentary discretion by Congress in the passage of a strictly constitutional and certainly a wholesome law as a ground for the charge of revolution. The great people will understand this, and we are more than willing to meet our opponents before them on this issue. They will overlook technicalities and mere parliamentary forms and consider it as it is, a contest on one side for a free and fair election and on the other for one controlled by the bayonet.

We should as statesmen subdue our party prejudices, allay any remaining passions of the war, and, rising to the level of the occasion, declare for free and fair elections, and not continue a system of legislation at which the historian in the future in recording it will be amazed.

But the excuse or pretext is that it is to preserve order. Recollect that the worst crimes against liberty have been perpetrated in the name of order. The monarchs of the Old World when undertaking any daring usurpation have always done it under the plea of conservatism and order, and we should not follow in their footsteps.

There is peace and quiet over the whole country, and there is now no necessity, if there ever was, for the longer continuance of this doubtful and dangerous system of legislation. We can safely trust to the ordinary instrumentalities of the law to secure fair and free elections.

In concluding these remarks I think it proper to say a word in justice to the memory of two honorable gentlemen who formerly represented the State of Kentucky in the United States Senate, Hon. Lazarus W. Powell and Hon. Garrett Davis. As reference has been made this morning to proceedings in the other branch of Congress for the expulsion of Senator Powell, I wish to say that Senator Davis, on a subsequent occasion, took pride and pleasure in apologizing upon the floor of the Senate, and I think in the presence of Mr. Powell himself, for his action in that matter, admitting that Mr. Powell probably had been right and he had been wrong. It is due to the fame of Senator Powell, and it is due to the magnanimity of Senator Davis, both gentlemen being now dead, that I, a Representative from a Kentucky district, should make this statement.

Mr. HERBERT. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BUCKNER.]

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Chairman, when the democratic party obtained the control of this House in the Forty-fourth Congress, its rules were so modified as to make it regular and in order to ingraft new legislation upon any of the general appropriation bills, provided only such legislation should be germane to the pending bill and should reduce the expenditures of the Government. Prior to that time, and during the supremacy of the republican party, it was the practice to change existing law so that the expenditures were increased and extravagance fostered. Under the operation of the rule as modified at the beginning of the Forty-fourth Congress the appropriation committee of this House has cut down the estimates of the Departments very largely, and decreased the net ordinary expenditures from $171,529,848.27 in 1875 to $134,463,452.15 in 1878. Much of this reduction is due to the adoption of this rule, and but for its existence no one of the repealing measures contained in the two bills which failed at the last Congress could have been added to them.

The primary object of this rule was to enable Congress to curtail the expenditures of the Government, which was often impossible without a repeal or modification of the legislation of former years, and wiping from the statute-book laws the enforcement of which not only swelled the annual exactions upon the people, but interfered with the constitutional rights of the States, prevented fair and impartial trials in the courts, trampled upon the rights of the citizen, and corrupted the ballot-box. To this category belong the several amendments involving new legislation which were ingrafted upon the Army and the legislative appropriation bills, which fell between the two Houses at the last session of Congress, and which have been substantially again brought before the House for its action at this special session.

That there are grave objections to this mode of legislation—that of tacking on to bills appropriating money for the support of the various departments of the Government independent and distinct legislation—will not be controverted. It has been condemned by men of all parties in the past, and still it has been resorted to again and again at almost every session of Congress for the last twenty years. In several of the States it is absolutely prohibited by constitutional provisions, but there is not only no constitutional prohibition against it in the Federal Constitution, but it is sanctioned and regulated by the rules of the House. It is a matter exclusively within the discretion and judgment of the House, under its rules, whether it shall pass each bill on its own merits, or combine several measures of a similar character in one bill and thus "log-roll" the whole into law.

The practice of tacking matters of legislation upon appropriation bills has become so common, and has been so generally adopted by the republican party, especially while it had control of Congress, that it is safe to say that some other reason exists for it than is now urged against this mode of parliamentary procedure by the minority of this House. A parliamentary custom, or indeed any other usage which is universally reprobated, on abstract principles, rarely ever obtains such a footing as the tacking of new legislation on ordinary bills appropriating money has secured in the legislation of Congress without good reason or some overruling consideration. While it may have been condemned by the minority at all times, and not always approved by the majority, the fact that it has been repeatedly sanctioned shows conclusively that there was an urgent necessity, or at least a seeming necessity, for its exercise.

Such, I apprehend, will be found, in a large majority of cases, the origin of this practice and the ground of its continued exercise by both parties when in control of both bodies of the Legislature or of the House of Representatives alone. An examination of the innumerable cases of "tacking," as it is called, will show that it has rarely been attempted at the first or long session of Congress, but that they have been reserved for the last or short session. New legislation, or legislation repealing or modifying existing law, has generally been resorted to when it became apparent that under the rules of the House bills embodying the desired new legislation could not be reported by committees having charge of them, or, if reported, could not be acted upon in time to reach the Senate and President. This happens to be true of one of the measures put on the legislative appropriation bill at the last session, and will no doubt be remembered by the members of the last Congress.

The Senate bill to repeal the jurors' test oath was on the Speaker's table, and there being great doubt whether that and other Senate bills in like condition could be acted upon in time under our rules an attempt was made to pass it by a two-thirds vote under a suspension of the rules, which was the only recourse then left to the friends of this bill. It failed to secure the requisite two-thirds, the republicans voting in the negative; and thereupon the friends of this repeal, after modifying the Senate bill so that it would come within the rules of the House, attached it to the legislative appropriation bill of the late session. The importance of repealing this obnoxious provision in the interest of fair and impartial trials in many of the States of the Union before the United States courts exercising criminal jurisdiction, and the impossibility of the repeal in any other mode, affords a complete justification of the action of the majority of the last House.

The same may be said of the repeal of the law giving authority to the President to station troops at the polls to keep the peace. In my judgment, the majority of the last House would have been recreant to their duty to have abstained from using all proper efforts authorized by the rules to repeal this unconstitutional and dangerous attack upon the right of local self-government. By those rules and in the then crowded condition of the business of the House it was an utter impossibility to bring this question before the House for its action as an independent measure and pass it in the Senate during the last session, and the only alternative left to the majority was to put it on one of the appropriation bills and trust to the Senate and President agreeing to it.

I maintain, therefore, Mr. Chairman, that the necessities of the occasion and the importance of the legislation in the given case, according to the judgment of the majority of this House for the time being, justify the practice of tacking new legislation upon bills appropriating money for the support of the Government; and while I should condemn as much as any member of the minority making it our daily legislative food, we ought not to surrender it as a medicine to be used in cases of extreme necessity. It has no doubt been abused in the past as it may be in the future; but it must be exercised under a just sense of the responsibility of each Representative to his constituents, to the Constitution, and to his Maker. It is a mode of procedure in accordance with the Constitution, sanctioned by the usage of all parties, and often absolutely necessary under the complicated and restrictive rules of the House to secure needful legislation demanded by the country.

If my time permitted I could show from the records of Congress, during the many long and dreary years when the republican party had undisputed control of all the departments of the Government, that many of the most important acts of legislation now on the statute-book were passed as parts of the general appropriation bills. Indeed one of the acts which it is proposed now to repeal in part is to be found harnessed to an appropriation bill; and I can say without the fear of successful contradiction that of the general appropriation bills enacted at the close of the short session of Congress a majority of such bills were passed containing general legislation, and most of them augmenting instead of reducing the expenditures of the Government. So common has this practice been that a distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Foster, not now a member of this House, and one of the House conferees on the Army appropriation bill, in some remarks made on the last day of the Forty-fifth Congress was forced to admit "that the republicans in times past had been in the habit of legislating upon appropriation bills," and further said that "he could not see any great harm in legislating upon appropriation bills when both Houses agree to it."

The same gentleman also said that he was willing to agree to the repeal of the clause authorizing the troops to be placed at the polls to keep the peace, as well as the jurors' test oath, and his then colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who addressed the committee a few days since with so much adroitness, ingenuity, and apparent earnestness, remarked in the same debate that he was "willing to abandon the first two of the differences between the two Houses, to give up the clauses in relation to the use of the Army, and to give up the jurors' test oath, if the other side would abandon the attempt to repeal the election laws."

I might go further and say that if the session of last Congress could have been prolonged for one or two days, in my judgment, the amendment to the election law, as now proposed, would have been accepted and both the appropriation bills passed.

In the face of these acknowledged facts; in the face of the fact that it has been the constant "habit" of the republican party since its advent to power to tack general legislation of all kinds on the appropriation bills; in the face of the fact that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] not a month since would have consented to this amendment as to the use of the military at the polls, and would also have been willing to give his sanction to this assumed "coercion" of the Executive, how does it happen that this able leader of the minority then and now can justify himself for his extraordinary speech of last week? How can he who, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee for years, adopted time and again this mode of legislation, and who but yesterday was ready to consent to the passage of the identical bill now before this committee, denounce the action of the majority as "revolutionary?" With what grace can he charge that we are attempting to repeat the history of 1861 by "starving" the Union to death instead of "shooting" it to death? Never before, Mr. Chairman, has this House witnessed such a tempest in a teapot. Never before has the country seen such an exhibition of extreme partisanship and electioneering clap-trap at the expense of consistency and common fairness, and I venture to say it will never again witness an attempt to engage in such a gigantic speculation with so small a capital, or to deduce such unjust and uncharitable conclusions from such false and groundless assumptions. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio will pardon me for reminding him that he has commenced the presidential campaign a year too soon, and that he ought not to attempt the impossible feat of jumping over the stile before he gets to it.

In the great eagerness of my friend from Ohio to serve his party he has, unwittingly I hope, perpetrated a gross injustice upon the many distinguished gentlemen who now represent the so-called Confederate States in this Hall. He would have his section and those who pretend to have fears of the rule of the "confederate brigadiers" believe that they are the special champions of the only amendment to which he made objection in the last Congress; for let it be borne in mind that the gentleman from Ohio made no determined resistance to the Army amendment or to that as to the test oath. The stumbling-block with him was the election and supervisor amendment, and it is to be inferred that it is our persistence in forcing this amendment upon an unwilling Executive that must lead the "confederate brigadiers" to resort to "starving the Union to death" as they attempted to "shoot it to death." It is due to truth to inform the gentleman from Ohio, if he is not aware of the fact, that not one of these gentlemen from the South originated this amendment or pressed it upon the attention of the House, but that the credit or discredit of it belongs exclusively to his own State. It was championed by one of his then colleagues, and strongly supported by at least three gentlemen in the last Congress from his State who were engaged in shooting at those who attempted to "shoot the Union to death."

It is in the loyal North, not in the disloyal South, that the system of supervisors and deputy marshals has become odious and offensive. It is north of Mason and Dixon's line that the money of the people has been squandered to corrupt the ballot-box and defeat the popular will; and it is a little ungracious in the gentleman from Ohio, in his efforts to make a solid North and to fan the slumbering fires of sectional hate, to attempt to fasten the stigma of revolution upon those who are as guiltless of any thought or desire to starve the Union to death as himself. In spite of the applause which greeted the distinguished gentleman from Ohio the other day from his political associates, he will pardon me for saying in all sincerity that the role of the partisan ill becomes him, and that he is never himself when he—

Narrows his mind
And gives up to party what was meant for mankind.

Mr. Chairman, I beg to inquire by what process of reasoning the gentlemen of the minority have come to the conclusion that we are meditating another war upon the Union, less "bold" and less "heroic" than that of 1861, it may be, but no less certain and destructive? In what consists the "revolutionary conduct, or object, or results of our proposed amendments?" There is no pretense that we propose anything unconstitutional, without precedent, or in violation of the rules governing the House. There is in point of fact no real objection, as admitted and confessed, to the repeal of the clause authorizing the use of the Army at the polls or of that provision of law authorizing the test oath to be administered to jurors in the Federal courts. It must, then, of necessity be that provision in the legislative bill which is not now before the committee, which, if adopted, will save to the people of this country two or three hundred thousand dollars every alternate year by amending the law as to the chief supervisors and special and ordinary deputy marshals.

It would be unfair as well as unjust to the gentlemen on the other side to affirm that they believe that the repeal of one or all of these laws would be "revolution" or lead to "revolution;" on the contrary, studiously avoiding the real issues presented by these amendments, as to their expediency, policy, or propriety, they are engaged in getting up a false clamor, and raising a hue and cry of revolution, and "destruction of the Government by 'starvation,' on assumptions which are as baseless as the fabric of a vision." They assume, first, that the President is unalterably opposed to these amendments, and that if presented to him in independent and separate bills he would refuse to approve them; that by putting them on the appropriation bills his free will is coerced and he may sign them rather than lose the appropriations, and that if he should veto them, Congress will adjourn without making the necessary appropriations for the support of the Government. Such are the assumptions on which they erect their raw head and bloody bones of "revolution" and "starvation of the Union."

Is there any gentleman on this floor that has authority to speak for the President? Has he so far forgotten his high position as to advise any member of this House that he will refuse his approval to either or both of these bills, and thus seek to coerce the action of this House and the Senate? I do not believe this of the Executive. It would be highly unbecoming in him, and I would rather believe that all this sheet-iron thunder has been manufactured to order to subserve the partisan purpose of the manufacturers themselves. I take it that if these bills are sent to the President he will canvass their merits and demerits, and either approve or reject them as the Constitution provides. It is not to be presumed that he will look beyond the contents of the bills themselves to determine his course, or that he will undertake to scrutinize the regularity or irregularity of their passage in either House.

If he follows in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessors, he will ask himself the question whether they are constitutional, whether they impinge upon the constitutional prerogatives of the Executive, and whether they are the offspring of passion or of calm and mature deliberation, and not whether he if a member of either House would have voted for or against them. I will not anticipate his action, and I protest against the improper and indecent attempt that is being made to coerce the President into a veto. The other assumption is no less groundless and unauthorized, and that is, if the President should, contrary to all precedent, veto a repeal of an existing law, this Congress will adjourn and refuse to make any appropriations for the Army or the legislative, executive, and judicial officers of the Government.

To justify this assumption, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio refers us to some remarks purporting to have been made by two leading democratic Senators at the other end of the Capitol. No one on this floor respects these gentlemen or their opinions more than I do; but I desire to say that it will be time enough to determine our action in this regard when the bills have been returned to this House, if they ever are, with the President's objections. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Our duty is with the present, and I will not anticipate the contingencies of the future.

The bills we propose to send to the President are authorized by the Constitution; they will go to him in a form sanctioned by usage and the rules of this House, and if disapproved by him he will commit the first act of revolution in forbidding the passage of laws for the support of the Government and the repeal of others obnoxious to the people and condemned by those who alone are authorized to speak for them in these Halls. I will utter no menace to coerce the President or frighten him from his propriety, nor will we be deterred from discharging our whole duty by any false clamor of "revolution" by those whose greatest apprehension is that we will do everything legally, decently, and in order. Fas est ab hoste doceri.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, at this advanced period of the debate I hesitate to take the floor. The discourses have been so varied that it seems to me we have lost sight for the moment of the single and precise issue before us. The discussion about the power of the Executive to veto such legislation as he may disapprove has been to my mind prematurely advanced. While I am not advised as to the intent of the President, should this bill pass with the obnoxious amendment and he return it with his veto, no lawyer or statesman can truly question his constitutional right to do so. The prudent navigator, when from untoward winds loses his latitude and the calm returns, sets his compass, takes his bearings, discovers where he is, and starts on a new departure. Imitating this instructive example, let us halt a moment and see where we are. We are sitting in extraordinary session, with the usual appropriation bill before us giving annual supply to the Army of the United States. This bill, sir, should, it seems to me, have passed the Congress closed March 4 last, thus saving the country the expense of this session and the general public the disturbance of political agitation. The cause of our pending difficulty is found in the tacking to the bill of an amendment changing existing law, which really regulates the right of military, naval, or civil officers of the United States to go, when properly called in obedience to law, and have or keep at the polls of any election in any State any troops or armed men to repel armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace. The existing law, section 5528 Revised Statutes, is as follows:

Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States or to keep peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years.

The amendment proposed and to be coerced through on this bill is to strike out the words "or to keep the peace at the polls." It appears the majority of the House intend this amendment shall be passed or the appropriation bill fall.

These, then, are the magic words. United States troops in no event are to be used to suppress any violence "or to keep the peace at the polls." Should this proposition prevail it will hereafter be unlawful for any military, naval, or civil officer or other person in the service of the United States to bring or keep at the polls any troops or armed men to keep the peace, suppress riot, or prevent bloodshed, although called for by the regular authorities of a State. The person violating such law will be fined, if convicted, $5,000 and imprisoned at hard labor not less than three months and possibly five years. Shall this amendment pass, or in case of an executive veto the Army, after the end of the fiscal year, go without supply?

DOES NOT PREVENT RUFFIANS OR KU KLUX.

Now, mark you, sir, this provision, if adopted, will not prevent any armed men being at the polls from partisan associations or under State control. The murderer, the ruffian of the northern city, the ku klux, the rifle club, or the white liner of the South will not be kept from the polls by the provisions of this amendment. The only persons prevented, in any contingency, from having armed men on duty or otherwise at the polls are United States officials, civil or military. There seems to be great terror of the United States having anything to do at an election by some people since certain occurrences in our history of the past eighteen years, and particularly from 1861 to 1865.

WAY THIS ISSUE CAME.

It may be instructive to the country at least, not already familiar with all the facts, to know how this issue came about. In the Forty-fifth Congress, which closed March 4, no Army appropriation bill passed. The history briefly is this: Mr. Hewitt, of New York, then a member of the House and of the Appropriations Committee, having charge of the bill for the support of the Army, some time in February last reported to the House an Army appropriation bill with some features of Army reorganization on it. The pending amendment was not attached, nor had it been considered by the committee, I am informed. When the bill was before the House I had the honor to offer as an amendment the bill substantially as agreed to by what is known as the Burnside-Army-reorganization joint commission. After protracted debate this amendment prevailed in the House. Then Mr. Hewitt, on his own account, as I understand, offered the pending proposition to change section 5528, Revised Statutes, by striking out "or to keep the peace at the polls." This passed with but little discussion after a yea-and-nay vote. Few in the last House, as I recall, imagined the failure of the Senate, then having a republican majority, to concur in this one amendment would lose an Army appropriation bill and cause this grave and important crisis to the country. The real bone of contention had been the reorganization feature.

What, sir, will be the effect of this obnoxious feature if it passes? It will hereafter be impossible in any contingency of a riot or breach of the peace at an election poll for any civil or military officer of the United States to have or bring any armed men to restore order and secure to the citizen voter the most valuable privilege of the American freeman. This is the issue. We are told if these words "or to keep the peace at the polls" are not stricken out of a statute, passed more than fourteen years ago, all supplies to the Army will be withdrawn.

NO PAY TO SOLDIERS.

The private soldier, away on the frontier fighting Sitting Bull, or in constant contact with the Indians, is to be refused subsistence and support. The Army officials are to be refused supplies. The engineers of the Army, under whose supervision the $7,000,000 the last Congress appropriated for river and harbor improvements are being expended, will have no means of support while this work, which gives so much employment to labor in this country, is going on. Grave results like this await us should this bill fail because of the effort to attach this objectionable amendment.

This bill last session going to the United States Senate, the pending proposition was stricken out. A committee of conference between the two Houses failing to agree, the bill fell, and this extraordinary session has been convened to get the necessary supplies for the Government. It has here been presented with this unnecessary amendment and pressed on the House.

This side of the House is thus to be thumb-screwed into the support of measures they do not approve in their consciences, or one branch of the public service must go without support. The President is to be coerced into the approval of a measure he may disapprove rather than your Army shall starve. This same rule, I understand, is to be applied to the other bill not yet before the House, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The several departments of the Government, the courts of justice in the country, are to go without necessary supplies, unless the repeal of certain bills made necessary by the results of the rebellion are agreed to by the President, or enough of this side of the House will unite with the other side to make the constitutional two-thirds to overcome a veto if one should be given by the President.

HOW THIS LAW CAME.

How, sir, did this little statute about which there is so much contention come into existence? How did it happen to be enacted into law some fourteen years ago? Its history has been given succinctly and carefully from time to time on the floor of the House. This statute was passed February 25, 1865, and approved by Abraham Lincoln as President. Until that time no United States law affecting the use of troops at the polls had been passed or was in existence. I look in vain over ancient enactments to discover a precedent of legislation on the subject. When the rebellion commenced in 1861, by the firing upon Sumter, this country was found singularly deficient in legislation sufficient to authorize the President to execute the laws, and to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution, as Mr. Lincoln said in his first inaugural he had an oath registered in Heaven to do.

The power to call for troops from different parts of the country under the circumstances, or to use the regular land and naval forces, was somewhat confused. The only statute existing for that purpose was the act of 1795, as modified by the act of 1807, which was sanctioned by Thomas Jefferson. The act of 1795 authorized the President to call upon the militia and the volunteers in the several States to enforce the laws. The act of 1807 modified it and enlarged it by giving him the power to employ for that purpose the land and naval forces of the United States when it was lawful to call the militia to suppress insurrection.

ACT OF 1861.

Congress, as we know, was called into extraordinary session, and upon the 25th of July, 1861, passed the law which is now in force and by virtue of which the President of the United States organized the volunteer force of the country and ultimately suppressed the rebellion. And, sir, in the course of the administration of that law and the conduct of the war through its tedious and sometimes horrid details, angry animosities arose in the country, partisan divisions in this House and in the co-ordinate branch. A bitter party here existed opposed to the administration of Mr. Lincoln in his effort to save the country, and as a consequence of that animosity Mr. Powell, then a Senator from Kentucky, as has been properly said, in 1864 introduced the law which is the cause of the present contention.

And, sir, I might pause for a moment and remark that Mr. Powell was in bitter antagonism to the administration of Mr. Lincoln, and in the course of the discussion of that very bill, referring to President Lincoln, he made some utterances like this:

This vacillating and, I fear, weak and corrupt man in the White House.

And there were kindred utterances which I could repeat, showing the hostility of Mr. Powell to the then Administration of the country. Of the controversy between the honorable Garrett Davis and Mr. Powell I will not pause to speak, more than to say, Mr. Garrett Davis, then a Senator, felt it his duty to introduce a resolution into the United States Senate to expel Mr. Powell therefrom because of his disloyal sentiments. This reference is pertinent to discover that this law was introduced here not at the instance or under the auspices of a republican Administration; it came from a source entirely hostile to the Government. And singular to say, and I wish gentlemen upon the other side who are devoted to the memory of Mr. Powell to mark it, Mr. Powell voted to place this very amendment "or to keep the peace at the polls" upon the existing law. It is quite true that this feature was not on the bill as originally proposed by him, and it is quite true that in the course of the discussion it was amended. But, sir, the point was made, and I press it to the attention of the House, that if the statute as originally introduced had passed and become a law the armed enemies of the United States, the rebels then defying the Federal authority, could not have been excluded from the polls in Maryland, in Kentucky, in Missouri, or in any State they may have invaded. In the discussion this was pressed home so strongly upon Mr. Powell that he consented to an amendment, "except to repel the enemies of the United States," which he offered himself.

Mark you, when these words were placed there they did not refer to foreign enemies but had reference to the rebels, then in arms against the authority of the United States; and while Mr. Powell's amendment "except to repel armed enemies of the United States" was pending, this amendment, the words "or to keep the peace at the polls," was offered to his amendment and carried, and for his amendment thus amended he and all other democratic Senators then voted, as the record shows.

The words, then, before us, "or to keep the peace at the polls," were added to the original by the unanimous vote of the Senate, as I remarked the other day. Hon. Lyman Trumbull, then a Senator, among others voted to add these specific words. On the final vote all the democratic Senators voted "yea" on the bill. It passed, indeed, as a democratic measure, such Senators as Buckalew, Garrett Davis, Hendricks of Indiana, Reverdy Johnson, Powell, and Trumbull voting for it. The final vote was—yeas 19, nays 13. You will thus observe had but a few democrats voted "nay" they could have defeated the measure thus amended.

REVERDY JOHNSON.

In the course of the discussion so high an authority as Hon. Reverdy Johnson—I have got his exact words here before me—made the remark in sanction of these words:

The bill as it has been amended and passed gives to the authorities of the United States the right to use their military power for the purpose of keeping the peace at the polls. It is consequently, if not exerted beyond that limit, a power within the competency of the Government.

Let me press that utterance from that distinguished legal authority and statesman in approval of the policy embodied in the words which you now propose, after the close of the war, to strike from this old statute in this coercive, unusual manner by attaching to an Army appropriation bill.

DEMOCRATIC CONSISTENCY.

Thus passing the Senate by democratic votes, the bill came to the House and was referred to the Judiciary Committee and reported without any change whatever. The history has been properly presented to the House and to the country. Such democrats as FERNANDO WOOD, S. S. COX, SAMUEL J. RANDALL, Speaker of this body, DANIEL W. VOORHEES, FRANCIS KERNAN, now a Senator, and my amiable colleague from the Somerset district, A. H. COFFROTH, voted for the bill. We heard Hon. FERNANDO WOOD make his apology for voting for the bill, and between him and his constituents let the consistency of his present position be settled. The original record shows no effort of his to amend or change in any way the text of the bill just as it is. We have not heard from the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] the versatility of whose genius equals that of his political record. We will doubtless hear before the debate closes an explanation of his course. Nor have I heard from my distinguished colleague, Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL, the Speaker of this House, who might possibly change the policy about this bill if he was so inclined. He may yet explain.

Then there is my amiable-countenanced neighbor, who represents upon this floor a district adjoining my own, elected here by republican votes, for his district is republican. He has been in Congress before, and I am gratified to know that he signalized his career at that time by leaving his party and voting for the thirteenth constitutional amendment, which abolished slavery. His was one of the two democratic votes, the other being that of Mr. McAlister, well known to my friend from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] who once lived in Pennsylvania, given for the thirteenth amendment. My colleague was a member when this bill passed the House. He was liberal in his politics then, and not tied to party, having been elected by a republican district.

Mr. COFFROTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. COFFROTH. I have nothing to say about voting for the thirteenth amendment. I have nothing to retract.

Mr. WHITE. Of course you have not.

Mr. COFFROTH. I voted for the thirteenth amendment because I viewed it then as a matter of right and justice. But I want to say to my friend that though I was liberal enough to vote with the republican party in passing that amendment, in the late canvass they used it against me, and published it through all their newspapers to urge democrats to vote against me because I was liberal on this floor and gave them a vote for that amendment.

Mr. WHITE. Well, they were naughty fellows, and they ought not to have done so. [Laughter.] Because of this the republicans possibly voted for him in the faith that he would be liberal on other questions when they came before the House. He can now signalize his election to Congress by voting with republican friends against attaching to the Army appropriation bill an amendment to a statute he voted for when before in Congress.

Mr. COFFROTH. My colleague will allow me to say a word. The large republican vote cast for me was cast because the republicans knew that I had the courage to do what was right, and because they knew that I would vote for all bills that were honest and right.

Mr. WHITE. Why, of course, of course. I congratulate my friend upon being an honest man, and for voting for that which he thinks to be right. From present indications I fancy that he is not going to forget party ties. I fear, in that respect, he will, like Sir Joseph, in Pinafore, tell his republican constituents who may complain, those frosty sons of thunder in Somerset County:

> I always voted at my party's call,
> And I never thought of thinking for myself at all.
> I thought so little they rewarded me
> By making me the ruler of the great navee.

[Laughter.]

I would hope my persuasive power may have some good influence on my colleague.

Mr. COFFROTH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. COFFROTH. He speaks of ruling the "Great Navee." I want to know if his boats are to sail upon the Kiskiminetas. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. I am obliged to my friend for talking about the Kiskiminetas. It is a representative idea. The engineers of the United States recommend its improvement for navigation purposes. This may result in great advantage to our State and give employment ultimately to some of our idle labor. We already have an appropriation for the improvement of the Allegheny. Should this Army appropriation bill fail, it will materially interfere with internal improvements in the country and the employment of many men now idle. Commending this thought to my friend, I trust that I shall have the friendship of my colleague in the Kiskiminetas idea before his term expires.

But, Mr. Chairman, all these democratic gentlemen who are now detaining this Congress for the repeal of this provision, voted for it originally, not like the ancient Pistol ate his leek, with protest and much grumbling, but without a word of criticism.

This, sir, is the history of the enactment which it is now proposed to change. I have given it correctly and appeal to the record. In the fourteen years since its passage no gentleman has offered or suggested a bill to strike out these words, "or to keep the peace at the polls." No popular demand for any modification of the statute as it originally passed came from any quarter that I have learned of.

No issue has ever been raised. Can it be that this issue is raised now because of the presence of gentlemen who were not here at the time of its enactment? Is it because the then vacant chairs from the southern part of the country have been filled? I leave it to the good sense of the House and the country to determine.

NO VIOLENCE AT THE POLLS.

But, Mr. Chairman, let it not be understood that this side of the House is in favor of force at the polls. It is a maxim in our Government, to be accepted by all as fundamental, that there shall be no violence, no intimidation, no riots or breaches of the peace at our elections. All disturbances, actual or threatened, likely to keep the legal voter from the poll or to impair the freedom of his ballot is foreign to the genius of our institutions. But, sir, when the Government gives this precious privilege there is concurrent duty to protect the voter in its peaceful exercise. The rounder and ruffian in the northern city must not invade the sanctity and peace of elections, nor must the white-liner or the rifle club in the South disturb the peace of an election to deter, possibly, the recently enfranchised negro from the freedom of his ballot.

ENGLISH STATUTE.

Reference has been made, sir, to the English statute of George II, 1735, regulating the quartering of soldiers during the time of the election of members to serve in Parliament. I hold it in my hand, but forbear to read its careful provisions. Much declamation has been indulged in about it to affect the pending issue. The circumstances suggesting the English statute were entirely different from those suggesting the statute about troops near the polls in America. The conditions of the English army and the manner of its support are different from ours. The English army is maintained, except in the extraordinary expenditures of a foreign war, from the revenues of the Crown. The American Army exists by law, and appropriations from the ordinary revenues of the Government are annually made for its support. Let us interpret this English statute by the known rules of interpretation, the old law, the mischief and the remedy. It is very well known from contemporaneous history that the statute of George II, 1735, which I hold in my hand, was enacted because of then prominent abuses. There was no law at that time preventing the stationing of troops at the election booths. Pending the election for 1734, the ministry, with the approval of the Crown, made out a list of sixteen scotch peers who were to be elected to Parliament from Scotland. These were the ministers' candidates, and troops, battalions of troops, were drawn up in Edinburgh court in violation of ancient custom, and without justifiable cause, except to overawe the electors.

When Parliament assembled, this statute was introduced and passed so that a recurrence of these evils should be impossible thereafter. A flagrant evil, occurring contemporaneously with the enactment of this statute, suggested its passage by Parliament, just as the injustice of their contested elections there suggested what is known as the Granville statute in 1780 for the creation of committees to try contested seats in Parliament. But, sir, somebody has asked in the course of the debate, when were troops in former days used at the polls? I think the inquiry was made by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] who yesterday read us a lecture upon this law. Why, sir, troops were called occasionally to election polls to keep the peace, when necessary, long before the oldest member of this body was born.

BUCKSHOT WAR IN PENNSYLVANIA.

In Pennsylvania, in 1838, though born before this I do not personally remember it, we had what is known as the "buckshot war." My friend before me [Mr. PRICE] remembers the "buckshot war" of 1838 in Pennsylvania. Rival political factions contended for the organization and possession of the State senate. In the selection of officers conflict and violence ensued. To promote the peace and suppress the violence, so the proper legislative organization couldbe. had, the governor sent for United States troops to Carlisle barrac ks General Sumner, then a captain, was stationed at Carlisle in command of United States troops. The governor called for him to go to the scene of political contention, and by the presence of his troops allay the controversy.

WASHINGTON IN 1856.

On the 12th of June, 1856, there was an election held in this city for municipal officers. This election was held under a statute giving the citizens of the District the right of electing their own officers.

I appreciate the point the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] made the other day when I referred to this instance, that it was a municipal election held in this District, over which, by the Constitution and the laws, the United States authorities had full jurisdiction and complete control. I grant you that. It is a case in point not as to jurisdiction, but as to policy; an example of occurrences of violence at elections where even democratic administrations found it proper to send United States troops to keep the peace, and this with the sanction of the then President. I hold in my hand the report of the grand jury inquiring into the circumstances of that election. It is signed by George W. Riggs, of this city, as foreman, and I read from it very briefly. After reciting the riot and violence near one of the election precincts, the report continues:

> Information of these disgraceful riotous occurrences was communicated to the mayor of Washington. At that time there was only one policeman and six or seven members of the Auxiliary Guard at the fourth ward. The mayor visited the scene, and having ascertained the true condition, forthwith called upon the President of the United States.

The recital continues that these marines went to the polls and there shot dead fourteen, as it was afterward alleged, innocent men and wounded twenty others. When the question came before this House for discussion, Hon. Mr. Burnett, a democratic Representative from Kentucky, in a speech I have before me, sanctioned it, saying that there was no other way by which the peace could have been secured to the citizen at that election so his freedom to vote could be enjoyed. He said: "How was it possible to protect citizens on a day like that which occurred at that election, when a gang of rowdies from a neighboring city came here, driving resident citizens from the polls, but shooting them down?" This policy was sanctioned by Franklin Pierce as President, and James Dobbin, Secretary of the Navy, and Jefferson Davis, of subsequent fame, as Secretary of War. Had the law to prevent any United States troops under any pretext "to keep the peace at the polls," you now propose to enact, then been in force, the violence at that election could not have been suppressed.

SECESSION ELECTION OF VIRGINIA OF 1861.

But the gentlemen of the opposition talk of troops at the polls. The lately rebellious States have supplied most conspicuous examples. I have before me high Kentucky authority that when the election was held in Virginia in 1861, to determine whether the "Old Dominion" would adhere to the Union, it was a simple mockery. I have here an extract from the Louisville Journal of June 1, 1861, high Kentucky authority, which I will read:

> The vote of Virginia last week on the question of secession was a perfect mockery. The State was full of troops from other States of the confederacy, while all the Virginia secessionists banded in military companies were scattered in various places to overawe the friends of the Union or drive them from the polls. The Richmond convention, in addition to other acts of usurpation, provided that polls should be opened in all the military encampments besides the ordinary voting places. No man voted against secession or resisted it except at the peril of being lynched or arrested as an incendiary, dangerous to the State.

That most gifted artist, John Rodgers, in the manufacture of those war statuettes which have made him famous, has made none more touching than the one representing the old Virginian—who, loving the memory of Washington and the fathers of his country, was attached to the old Union—going with feeble step to the polls, supported upon the arm of a loved daughter, with a Union vote in his hand; when reaching the poll the cavalier-looking election officer, sitting with Colt's revolver beside the ballot-box, queries the old patriot with perplexing questions, refuses his vote, and intimidates him from the grounds.

Gentlemen from Virginia and North Carolina, both of which States I believe were coerced by military force and violence at the polls to go out of the Union, should be familiar with instances of disturbances at the polls, with instances of their citizens going there and discovering themselves prevented from voting their real sentiments. But I can refer to other instances. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. WILLIAMS] read to you this morning the order of General George B. McClellan, in reference to elections in Maryland in 1863. I read but an extract. This order is dated October 29, 1863, and says:

The major-general commanding directs that you send detachments of a sufficient number of men to different points in your vicinity where the elections are held to protect Union voters and see that no disunionists are allowed to intimidate them, or in any way to interfere with their rights. He also desires you to arrest and hold in confinement till after election all disunionists who are known to have returned from Virginia and who show themselves at the polls, and to guard effectually against any invasion of the peace and order of the election.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

On this side of the Chamber we recognize Abraham Lincoln as pretty good authority; possibly he is not authority on the other side. I read an extract from his letter of November, 1863, to Governor Bradford, of Maryland, on this subject:

That the provost-marshal and other military officers do prevent all disturbance and violence at or about the polls, whether offered by such persons as above described, or by any other person or persons whatsoever.

There are other instances to which I could refer where the presence of the United States troops or armed men to secure peace at the polls and to secure the right of free elections are set forth in the history of our elections in this country.

OCTAVIUS CATO.
